THE PREFACE.

The publication of this second volume of the FAMILY EXPOSITOR hath been delayed so long, beyond my own expectation, and that of my friends, that it may perhaps seem necessary to introduce it with an apology for that delay. But it would be tedious to enumerate a variety of circumstances which have concurred to occasion it. It is generally known, that the unusual severity of the last winter laid a kind of embargo on the press; and they that are at all acquainted with the business of printing, will easily apprehend, that under the most faithful and careful direction, a work of considerable bulk is liable to many other interruptions, even where the manuscript is entirely finished before the impression is begun. But after all, the chief reason why this hath been published no sooner, is (what I hope my subscribers will easily excuse) the large addition I have made of more than fifty sheets to the hundred which I was by the proposals obliged to deliver.

On the mention of this, I think myself obliged to renew my thanks to those, who, by honouring me with their names and encouragement on this occasion, have put it into my power to publish the work with such improvements; and shall think myself happy, if those improvements, however laborious and expensive to the author, may render it more acceptable and useful to them.

The tables prefixed to the first volume are included in this, and represent the disposition of the harmony in so clear a view, that by comparing them together it would not be difficult to find any particular text. But a deference to the request of some of the subscribers, engaged me to add another table at the end of this volume (of the same kind with that in Mr. Bonnell’s Harmony) which will at once direct both to the section and page where any verse may presently be found.

I cannot pretend so much as to conjecture when the remainder of my undertaking will be completed. I shall however proceed in it as fast as my health and other affairs will permit. In the mean time, I think it necessary to observe, that I have, by the advice of some considerate and judicious friends, deferred the index, and some other things which I intended to have thrown into an appendix here, till I have finished what I am preparing on the Acts; that so they may stand, as they very properly will, at the end of the historical books of the New Testament.

The Family Expositor being originally printed in six volumes, the second volume began with sect. xc. but, the present edition being comprised in five volumes, our second begins with sect. cxvi. and the tables of chapters and sections which were formerly divided between the two volumes, are now found at the beginning of the first. Such a change, though we notice it, is of no great importance, and is attended with no disadvantage to the reader. Probably most will consider it an alteration for the better.

How
How far the subscribers to these two volumes may think it proper to encourage the rest, must be referred to themselves. In the mean time, as that must be exceeding precarious which depends on the continuance of one man’s life and health, I would desire permission here to take leave of my friends, at least for the present, with such a serious address as may be the most substantial expression of my sincere gratitude and respect.

I should have thought, my honoured friends, that I had made you a very unworthy return for this public token of your regard to me, if I had offered you merely an amusement, though ever so critical and polite. It had been much better, on both sides, that the work should never have been undertaken or perused, than that these Divine authors should be treated like a set of profane classics; or that the sacred and momentous transactions they relate should be handled and read like an invented tale, or a common history. I have often reminded myself of it, and permit me now, Sirs, solemnly to remind you, that these are the memoirs of the holy Jesus, the Saviour of sinful men, whom to know is life eternal, and whom to neglect is everlasting destruction. We have here the authentic records of that gospel which was intended as the great medicine for our souls; of that character which is our pattern; of that death which is our ransom; of him, in short, whose name we bear as we are professed Christians, and before whose tribunal we are all shortly to appear, that our eternal existence may be determined, blissful, or miserable, according to our regard to what he has taught, and done, and endured. Let not the greatest therefore think it beneath their notice; nor the meanest imagine, that, amidst all the most necessary cares and labours, they can find any excuse for neglecting, or even for postponing it.

Had I not been fully convinced of the certainty and importance of Christianity, I should not have determined to devote my whole life to its service (for on the principles of natural religion, I know the soul to be immortal, and should expect nothing but its ruin in the ways of the most sanctified fraud;) but as I am thus convinced, I must make it my humble request to every one that enters on the perusal of these volumes, that they may, for a little while at least, be the employment of his retired hours; and that as he proceeds from one section to another, he would pause and reflect, “Whose words do I hear? Whose actions do I survey? Whose sufferings do I contemplate?” And as all must know they are the words, the actions, and the sufferings of Jesus the Son of God, our supreme Lord, and our final Judge, let it be farther and very seriously inquired in what degree the obvious and confessed design of the glorious gospel has been practically regarded and complied with: “Can I, in my heart, think that I am a disciple whom such a Master will approve, and whom he will choose for his attendant in that world of glory to which he is now gone?” Let the plainness of this advice be forgiven; for such is the temper and conduct of most who call themselves Christians, that, if this religion be true, their cold and unaffected knowledge of the history of Christ, and of the purposes of his appearance, will only serve to furnish out matter for eternal self-accusation and remorse: and he is, at best, but a learned and polite infidel who would not rather be the instrument of conducting the lowest creature, capable of reading or hearing these lines, to the saving knowledge of a crucified Redeemer, than fill the most refined nation with his own applause, while the grace of the Saviour is forgotten, or his service neglected.

I have yet one farther request to add to those of my readers who are heads of families; which is, that they would please to remember the title of the work, and consider it as chiefly intended in its most essential parts, for a Family Expositor. I heartily rejoice in the reason which I have to hope, that low as our religious character is fallen in these degenerate days, acts of domestic worship are are yet performed by multitudes of Christians of various denominations: yet I cannot but fear, that the scriptures are not so constantly read at such seasons as they formerly were; an omission which must be to the great detriment both of children and servants. One would think, that those who believe the Divine authority of scripture, and its infinite importance, should be easily prevailed upon to restore this useful exercise, at least for one part of the day; and I would hope, that what I here offer them may render it more agreeable and useful. It would give me inexpressible delight to find that this is the case in those families with which I am most intimately acquainted; and would be an encouragement to hope this work may be proportionably useful in places and times to which neither my observation nor intelligence can extend.

I shall conclude this preface, with my hearty prayers, that, weak and imperfect as these labours are, the Divine blessing may every where and always attend them; and that it may rest on all who have patronized them, and on all who shall peruse them! May every prejudice against the truth of Christianity, or against its power, be vanquished! May the most insensible minds be awakened to attend to religion, and may the weak and languishing be animated to press on to greater attainments in it! May those that are preparing for the service of the sanctuary (as every part of this performance is their concern,) be by every part of it more abundantly furnished for the various duties of their important office! And may those who are as yet but babes in knowledge, through the Divine blessing grow by that sincere milk of the word, which is here presented, as I trust, in its genuine simplicity! In a word, may many persons, families, and larger societies, receive devout pleasure and solid lasting improvement from it; that the great God, of whom and through whom are all things, may in all be glorified, through Jesus Christ our Lord, who in all the sacred volumes, and especially here, is the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End, the First and the Last, to whom be everlasting honour, love, and obedience! Amen.

THE LATTER PART OF THE HISTORY OF CHRIST AS RECORDED BY THE EVANGELISTS.

SECT. CXVI.

Christ, on the mention of some calamities which had befallen others, warns his hearers of the danger they were in, if they did not repent, and illustrates it by the parable of the barren fig-tree. Luke XIII. 1—9.

Now, while our Lord was thus discoursing of the necessity of being at peace with God, some who were present at that time; told him of those unhappy Galileans, the followers of Judas Gaulonites; who had rendered themselves obnoxious to the Roman power by some acts or principles of resistance to it; and whose blood Pilate the governor had in effect mingled with their sacrifices, having circumvented and slain them when they were come to worship in the temple at a public feast.

And

In this story of the Galileans, Josephus has given us the story of this Judas Gaulonites at large, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 1, § 1. (See also Bell, Jud. lib. ii. cap. 8, (al. 7); § 1; cap. 17. § 8; & lib. vii. cap. 8. (al. 28), Havercamp.) It appears he was at the head of a sect who asserted God to be their only Sovereign; and were so utterly averse to a submission to the Roman power; that they accounted it unlawful to pay tribute unto Cæsar, and rather would endure the greatest torments than give any man the title of Lord. This Judas is probably the person whom Gamaliel refers to by the name of Judas of Galilee, Acts v. 37. — Josephus does not mention the slaughter of these Galileans (which, by the way, makes Zegerus's interpretation very improbable, that they were actually slain at the altar, in contempt of the temple); but he records an action of Pilate that much resembles it, of the manner of his treating the Samaritans; Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 4 (al. 5), § 1.—Perhaps this story of the Galileans might now be mentioned to Christ with a design of leading him into a snare, whether he should justify or condemn the persons that were slain.
And Jesus, without making any remarks on the cause on which they were engaged, endeavoured, with his usual wisdom and piety, to lead the minds of his hearers into some profitable reflections upon the event; and, in reply said to them, Do you think that these Galileans were notorious sinners above all the rest of the Galileans, that they suffered such sad things as these, and were cut off in so miserable a manner? If you do, you are very unfit to judge of the conduct of Providence: for, howsoever you may censure them, as shewn hereby to be the most enormous sinners, I tell you, No; you are not to conclude from hence, this was the case; but, except you repent, you shall all perish thus; vengeance will overtake you in your evil ways, and, in the desolating judgments, that will shortly come on your whole nation, the blood of many of you shall be mingled with your sacrifices.

4 Or, to instance in another unhappy case that has lately occurred, I mean that of those eighteen men on whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them, do you think they were greater offenders than all the other inhabitants of Jerusalem, that they were thus providentially singled out for destruction? I tell you, No; you would judge very rashly if you were in general to draw such conclusions; for the best of men may be involved with others in temporal calamities: but remember what I told you before, that, except...
except you repent, you shall all perish thus; you shall be pressed under the insupportable load of the Divine vengeance, and be destroyed under the ruins of that holy city in which you trust.

And, in order to awaken them more effectually to such deep and serious repentance, he spake this parable to them; There was a certain man who had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard; and he came, for several successive seasons, searching for fruit upon it, but he found none. And at length, despairing of any better success, he said to the keeper of the vineyard, Behold, these three years together I have come to look for fruit upon this fig-tree, and still I find none; cut it down therefore immediately, as a barren tree: for why does it thus cumber the ground, filling up the place of more profitable plants with its useless bulk, and drawing away nourishment from those that grow round it? But such was the concern of the vine-dresser for its preservation, that he said to him in reply, Sir, I desire thou wouldst let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it:

And if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.

d These three years.] Many have supposed that these words allude to the time of Christ's personal ministry, which, as most have computed the chronology of the New Testament, had now lasted three years; but it is certain the patience of God bore with them much longer than another year. Grotius therefore thinks it more probable, it may refer to the nature of a fig-tree, which, if it bear at all, generally begins to do it within three years after it is planted; but might to be sure be looked upon as barren if it had disappointed the expectations of the planter three years together after the time, in which it should have yielded fruit, which was yet worse.
"Perhaps it may bear fruit: xéδ ντεν τρεις γενήσεων κατά."

It is in the original something of an abrupt way of speaking, of which Raphelius has produced many examples, (Annali. ex. Xeni. p. 102, 103); but I think, the way of rendering the idiom I have here used, would suit it in most of those instances.

the proposal of the gospel in its full extent and evidence, they must expect nothing but speedy, irresistible and irrecoverable ruin.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. Which of us may not learn a lesson for himself from this instructive parable of the fig-tree? Have we not long been planted in God's vineyard, and favoured with the cultivation of his ordinances, yea, with the dews of his grace too; and yet how little fruit have we borne in proportion to those advantages? How long has he come seeking it in vain, while we have frustrated the most reasonable expectations, perhaps not only for three, but several of us for more than thirty years? Wonderful is it, that the dreadful sentence has not long since gone forth against us, Cut them down, why cumber they the ground? We owe it to the intercession of our Blessed Redeemer, the Great Keeper of the garden of God, that this has not long since been our case. Let us not be high minded, but fear! (Rom. xi. 20.) Let barren sinners reflect, that this may be the last year; perhaps indeed the last month, or last day of their trial; for even now also is the ax laid to the root of the tree! (Mat. iii. 10.) And let them remember, that though there be a hope of a tree, when it is cut down, that it may sprout again, (Job xiv. 7), yet, when the doom is executed on them, their root will be as rottenness, and their blossom will go up like dust (Isa. v. 24); and every tree which brings not forth good fruit, will be hewn down, and cast into the fire.

2 Let such therefore meditate terror, when the judgments of God are abroad in the earth; and, when others are overwhelmed in ruin, let them not harshly censure the sufferers, as if they were greater sinners than any others; but let them apply that salutary, though awful admonition to their own souls, repeating it again and again, till they are pricked to the heart by it, Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

Terrible indeed was the case of those, whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, and of those who were dashed to pieces in a moment by the fall of Siloam's tower; but infinitely more dreadful will be the condition of them, that fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. x. 31), especially of those deceivers, who, having surrounded his altars with the hypocritical forms of devotion, shall themselves be made the victims of his justice, and be crushed by the resistless weight of his almighty vengeance.

† Under the additional cultivation, &c.] The extraordinary means used to bring them to repentance after the resurrection of Christ, by the effusion of his Spirit, and the preaching of the apostles, might, with great propriety, be expressed by digging round the barren tree, and applying warm compost, or dung, to its roots.

Sect. CXVII.

Christ cures a crooked woman in the synagogue.

Thus our Lord went on in his journey through Galilee for a considerable time; and as he was teaching in one of the synagogues on the sabbath-day, Behold there was present a poor disabled woman, who (as the Jews used commonly to express it, and was now actually the case) had been afflicted by a spirit of weakness 2 no less than eighteen years, and was bowed together in so sad a manner that, from the time it first seized her, she was utterly unable to raise herself upright 3, or to stand straight.

And Jesus seeing her, and intimately knowing all the sad circumstances of her affliction, and the difficulty with which she was then come to attend the solemnities of Divine worship there, called her to him, and said to her, Woman, thou art loosed from that affliction, which thou hast long been under by reason of thy weakness and malady. And, as he was speaking these words, he laid his hands upon her, and immediately she was strengthened, and made straight; so that she stood before them all in an erect posture, and moved with as much ease and freedom as if she had never been disabled: and, as was most reasonable, she in a very affectionate manner glorified God before the whole assembly; praising him for so signal and unexpected a favour, and a Had been afflicted by a spirit of weakness.] It is very evident the Jews apprehended that all remarkable disorders of body proceeded from the operation of some malignant demon. Perhaps they might draw an argument from what is said of Satan's agency in the affliction of Job, (chap. i. and ii.) and from Psal. cxvi. 6. (Compare Septuag, and 1 Sam. xvi. 14. They also considered Satan as having the power of death. Heb. ii. 14.—And that, in some maladies, this was indeed the case, is intimated by our Lord's reply here, ver. 16, and by St. Paul's words, 1 Cor. v. 5, where he speaks of delivering an offender to Satan for the destruction of the flesh.—

b Utterly unable to raise herself upright.] This version of μὴ ἀναλύσῃ τῇ αὐτῇ as to σπαθίς seems preferable to that other which the words as to σπαθίς might bear: "She could not lift herself up, so as to stand perfectly straight." (Compare Heb. vii. 25. Gr.) For on the rendering I have given, which is equally literal, the miracle appears much more important than on the other.
and declaring how long her illness had continued, and how desperate and incurable it was thought.

Luke XIII. 14. But a ruler of the synagogue, instead of joining in acknowledgments of the Divine power and goodness displayed in that gracious action of our Lord, was moved with indignation, which he endeavoured to disguise under the form of piety and zeal; and, as if he only had been angry because Jesus had healed her on the sabbath-day, he answered and said unto the people, There are six days on which the common work of human life must be done, on some of these therefore you may surely find time to come and be healed, and should not make these applications on the sabbath day, which you know is appropriated to the sacred purposes of religious rest and worship.

15 Then the Lord answered him with a just severity, and said, Thou hypocrite, who thus makest thy pretended zeal for the honour of Divine institutions a specious cloak for thy malice against me, art thou not self-condemned? Does not every one of you, even the Pharisees and rulers of synagogues among the rest, without any scruple or blame, loose his ox or his ass from the manger and lead him away to drink on the sabbath-day, as well as any other: though the work be more servile than what I have done, and the occasion far less important? Now, if you have such a regard to the thirst of one of your cattle, was it not much more apparently fit, that this good woman, who is a believing daughter of Abraham, whom

c A ruler of the synagogue.] It is plain that there were several rulers of the same synagogue. (Compare Mark v. 22, Acts xiii, xviii. 8, 17.) And Dr. Lightfoot and Vitringa have observed that, in every town where there was a synagogue, there were at least ten men who were obliged to attend on the public worship in it. Of these, three were called rulers, who presided in directing the worship, and judged of such little disputes and litigations as might be determined in the synagogue; but not without a reserve of appeal to the several superior courts. If of these three there was any one who had a distinguished authority, and might by way of eminence be called the ruler of the synagogue, it is strange the Jewish writers omit to mention it, which, so far as I can recollect, they never do; see Wolfius on this text, and Vitringa, Synag. Vet. p. 585.

4 Even the Pharisees and rulers of synagogues among the rest.] Had not this been generally the case, the answer would not have been sufficient for conviction in the present circumstance. Perhaps this ruler might that very day have been performing such an office for one of his cattle with his own hands: I say, with his own hands; for it was by no means essential to his being a ruler of the synagogue that he should be a person of wealth or dignity in common life; though probably, in large and splendid cities (such, for instance, as Capernaum was), such persons might generally be chosen.—Critics have collected passages from rabbinical writers, in which they allow it to be lawful to feed or water a beast on the sabbath-day. See Lightfoot’s Hor. Heb. on this text; where he shews they were expressly allowed even to draw water for their beasts; a much more laborious work than leading them to it. See also Wolton’s Miscel. Vol. II. p. 41—46.

17 And when he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed; and all the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him.

18 Then said he, Unto what is the kingdom of God like? and whereunto shall I resemble it?

19 It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took, and cast into his garden, and it grew, and waxed a great tree: and the fowls of the air lodged in the branches of it.

20 And again he said, Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God?

21 It is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened.

22 And he went through the cities and villages, whom Satan, by the Divine permission, has bound in this cruel manner, lo, for these eighteen years together, should be loosed from this bond even on the sabbath-day, especially when it might be effected without any labour, by no more than a word and a touch.

And when he had said these things, all his opposers were ashamed, and perfectly confounded by the strength of such obvious and conclusive reasoning: and all the multitude who were present rejoiced in his triumph; for they were greatly delighted with all the wonderful and glorious things that were done by him, in which there was so amiable a display of his goodness as well as his power.

Now on this occasion, for the farther encouragement of his friends, and confusion of his enemies, our Lord thought proper to intimate the great increase of his kingdom, notwithstanding the malignant opposition it should meet with, which he illustrated by two parables formerly delivered elsewhere: and he said, To what is the kingdom of God like, and what shall I compare it to? or how is it that I shall represent the propagation of the gospel in the world? It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took and sowed in his garden: and from so minute a seed it grew to a prodigious bulk, and became such a great tree, that the birds of the air came and lodged in its branches. So shall my kingdom, which in its first beginning seems to be contemptible, diffuse itself in time over the whole world, and the inhabitants of distant nations shall seek their shelter in it. (Compare Mat. xiii. 31, 32. and Mark iv. 30—32. Vol. VI. p. 353, 354.

And again he said, To what else shall I liken the kingdom of God, of which I have now been speaking? or how shall I describe the efficacy of its doctrine? It is like a little quantity of leaven, which a woman took and covered up in a mass of dough, consisting of no less than three measures of meal; and yet it insinuated and diffused itself throughout till the whole lump was leavened. So shall the gospel make its way, and, by a secret influence, shall spread its efficacy through the hearts of men, till it has changed them into a likeness to itself. (Compare Mat. xiii. 33. Vol. VI. p. 354.)

And thus he went through all the principal cities and villages of Galilee, teaching them where-wheresover he came, and travelling on toward Jerusalem; to which he had now begun to steer his course, as he intended to be there at the approaching feast of the dedication, John x. 22. sect. cxxxiv.) and to spend the little remainder of his time during his continuance upon earth in that city, or the neighbouring parts; no more returning to these northern regions, till he appeared here after his resurrection.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. Again do we see, in a very instructive instance, the power and goodness of Christ. It wrought on a poor despised creature; but our Lord considered her as a daughter of Abraham, and honoured, even in her, whatever traces of her father Abraham’s faith and piety his penetrating eye might discern. Her zeal and willingness to attend on public worship brought her out, though she could not stand upright, and had probably in that respect a much better excuse for staying at home than many could make, who now often absent themselves from the much nobler services of the Christian sanctuary.

10, 13 She met with Christ in the synagogue, and returned with a cure. And oh, how many, as the effect of such a pious zeal, though they have not been loosed from their infirmities, have at least been greatly strengthened to bear them.

16 Our Lord says that Satan had bound her. That malignant enemy to our bodies and souls rejoices in any opportunity of hurting either. But it is pleasing to think, that his power is always under the control of Christ; and therefore shall never be exercised on his people any farther than their gracious Redeemer sees it consistent with their good, and will take care to render it subservient to it.

14 How gravely does this ruler of the synagogue instruct the people in a point of ceremony, while his heart was full of enmity to Christ, and hardened against every sentiment of human compassion! Justly was his hypocrisy confounded and exposed:

We should with pleasure see this Sun of Righteousness thus victoriously breaking through those clouds, which envy and malice had raised to obscure him, and diffusing his sacred light from one end of the heavens to the other. With pleasure should we view the accomplishment of these parables, which represent the success of his gospel as so great; and we should daily pray, with increasing earnestness, that all the remaining nations and kingdoms of this world may at length become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ: and sincere converts flock to him from every side, even as doves to their windows! (Rev. xi. 15. and Isa. lx. 8.)

SECT.
CHRIST warns his hearers of the difficulty and importance of entering into the kingdom of heaven: and is not intimidated by the fear of Herod from pursuing his work. Luke XIII. 23, to the end.

AND, as Jesus was proceeding in his journey towards Jerusalem, where he designed to be present at the feast of the dedication, being attended by several of his disciples, in a pretty large compass which he took by the way, one of them said to him, Lord, are there [but] few that shall be saved? Surely, if thy kingdom be so extensive as these parables intimate, see ver. 19, 21.) the number must be very inconsiderable.

But he said to them, Instead of amusing yourselves with such curious inquiries with relation to others, attend to what more nearly concerns you, and be solicitous to secure your own safety: And let me urge it upon you, that you

24 Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able.

25 When once the Master of the house is risen up, and hath shut the door, and thou comest thrust out, and shalt stand without, weeping and wailing, because of the great distance from Jerusalem [Lightfoot's Disquisit. Chorog. in Joun. cap. vii. § 1.) the argument which Mr. Whiston draws from thence in favour of his order must be very inconclusive. See Whiston's Harmony, p. 383 and 403.

a Where he designed to be present at the feast of the dedication.] Mr. Whiston and some others place the following passages in a different order, and introduce them after this feast; but it does not appear that Christ was ever in Galilee before his resurrection, after his journey. He was indeed at Ephraim, or Ephrem, (John vi. 54. sect. cxii.) but, as that city lay on the confines of the tribe of Benjamin, at no great distance from Jerusalem (Lightfoot's Disquisit. Chorog. in Joun. cap. vii. § 1.) the argument which Mr. Whiston draws from thence in favour of his order must be very inconclusive. See Whiston's Harmony, p. 383 and 403.

b Exert your utmost strength to enter in at the strait gate.] The original word, ευνοεσθε της διαστασεως αυτης, not merely means to desire to enter, but is a very strong expression for the exertion of the utmost strength to enter in at the strait gate. It imports the act of contending in the most ardent and resolute manner with antagonists in games or in war; and may well intimate that the strait gate is beset with a variety of enemies, through which, if we aspire to a crown of eternal glory, we must break and force our way: a representation equally just and awakening! Compare 1 Cor. ix. 25. Col. i. 29. 1 Tim. vi. 12, and 2 Tim. iv. 7.

c Many will seek to enter in.] The Prussian version renders it, shall try, or attempt; but I apprehend from the context, that it refers to importunate entreaties when they were actually excluded, rather than to feeble attempts now; though it is an awful truth that these likewise will be unsuccessful.

Many at last shall cry in vain to be admitted.

Nevertheless, but have risen up from his seat, and with his own authoritative hand shall have shut and barred the door, and you among the rest, shall begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, we beseech thee, open to us; but you will cry in vain, and he who now so graciously invites and waits upon you, shall then reply to you, I know you not, who you are, or from whence you are come; but determine to treat you as strangers, for whom I have no friendship or regard, and who have never been approved by me.

Some of you may perhaps then plead an intimate acquaintance and professed friendship, and urge the privileges that you once enjoyed, and the conspicuous figure you made in his church: but if any of you can carry it so far as that you shall begin to say, Lord, we have eaten and drank in thy presence in a familiar manner, and thou hast thyself lived among us, and often taught in our streets and houses, so that thou canst not sure have forgot us: Nevertheless, he will persist in disowning you, and say; I tell you again, I know you not, and, whatsoever you pretend to, I regard not whence you are; all that former relation to which you refer, is (as it were) blotted from my remembrance, since your hearts were still insincere, and your lives unsuitable to your fair professions; and therefore depart from me, alle ye that habitually practise iniquity; for none of your character shall ever be admitted here. (Comp. Mat. vii. 22, 23, Vol. VI. p. 238, 239.)

This awful word, how little soever you may now regard it, shall wound you to the heart, and throw you into agonies of everlasting despair: and there shall be the bitterest weeping and gnashing of the teeth for madness and rage, when you shall see your holy ancestors, Abraham, shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence you are:

Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets.

But he shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence you are; depart from me, alle ye workers of iniquity.

There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all

4 The master of a family, &c.] There is a majesty and pathos in this passage, as in many others, which no paraphrase can retain, in which the very words of our Lord no not make a part.

e We have eaten and drank in thy presence.] Perhaps some of the nine thousand whom he had fed by miracle may at last be in this miserable number. (Compare John vi. 26.)—Brennius refers it to their having eaten the sacrifices presented to God according to the Mosaic constitution. But different persons may use this plea in different senses; and they who, while their hearts are hardened in impenitence and unbelief, have profaned the Lord's supper by an unworthy participation of it, will find a sad sense peculiar to themselves; though it might not be chiefly intended.

all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves, thrust out.

29 And they shall come from the cast, and from the west, and from the north, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God.

30 And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last.

31 The same day there came certain of the Pharisees, saying unto him, Get thee out, and depart hence: for Herod will kill thee.

32 And he said unto them, Go ye and tell that fox, Behold I cast out

Ham and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets of the succeeding ages, in actual possession of the kingdom of God; and shall find yourselves cast out with contempt, and thrust back with just indignation. Yea, they shall come from the most distant heathen lands, even from the east and the west, and from the north and the south, and shall sit down in joyful multitudes, to partake of the heavenly banquet with your pious ancestors in the kingdom of God, while you are utterly excluded from it. (Compare Mat. vii. 11, 12, and note f, Vol. i. p. 295.)

And, behold, this shall be the case, not only of a few, but of great numbers; for there are many who are now last in point of religious advantages, that shall then be first in honour and happiness; and there are many who now appear first, that shall then be found last; and, on account of their abused privileges, shall appear as the most infamous and miserable of mankind. (Compare Mat. xix. 30, and Mark x. 31, sect. cxxxvii.)

These things our Lord said in his journey through Galilee towards Jerusalem; making many pauses in his way, that, in consequence of the shortness of his stages, he might have an opportunity of greater usefulness. And it came to pass on that day, when he uttered these discourses, some of the Pharisees came, and that they might, if possible, intimidate and drive him to a distance, they said to him, Go forth, and depart from hence, with all possible speed into the territories of some other prince; for Herod the tetrarch, in whose dominions thou art, is at this very time determined to kill thee; as he did John the Baptist, thy friend and associate, and seeks but an opportunity to effect it.

But Jesus was so far from being at all alarmed at this intimation, that he said to them with great steadiness, Go, and tell that fox, that crafty, wicked, f Herod is determined to kill thee: ἔτοιμος ἐστίν ἀποκτείνειν. For the force of this phrase compare note b on John vii. 17, sect. xxix. and note a, on John i. 43, Vol. i. p. 126. It is very probable, considering both the wicked character and suspicious temper of Herod, that though he had a curiosity to see Christ (compare Luke ix. 9, xxiii. 8) he was uneasy at his spending so much time in Galilee, lest he should occasion him some embarrassment either with regard to the Jews or the Romans; yet fearing, after all the anxiety which the murder of John the Baptist had given him, to make any attempt on his life, he might think fit thus to endeavour to terrify him with an empty threatening. In this view there would be a peculiar propriety in calling him fox, rather than lion, wolf, or bear, to which savage beasts the prophets had sometimes, with a plainness becoming their character, compared wicked princes. Compare Zephaniah iii. 3. Ezekiel xxii. 27. and Prov. xvii. 12.

wicked, and voracious prince, Behold, I cast out demons, and perform cures in thy dominions to-day, and to-morrow, and carry on my work a little while longer, and the third day I shall be perfected: for the appointed time will quickly come when I shall finish my course, and have done all that I intend here. In the mean while he may well allow me a licence to stay in his territories so long, at least on such kind and gracious designs: or however he may be unwilling to allow it, yet, nevertheless, I must go on in this leisurely progress (as I just now said) to-day, and to-morrow, and the third day, till the determined season comes in which my ministry shall be fulfilled: nor do I fear the effects of Herod's malice; for it cannot be supposed that a prophet should perish, or be put to death, any where out of Jerusalem; that unhappy city, the seat of the supreme court, challenging, as it were, to itself, the sad prerogative of being the slaughterhouse of the messengers of God.

And upon this, turning, in thought at least, towards Jerusalem, though it lay at the distance of so many miles, he took up a most affectionate lamentation over it, and said, O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou guilty and miserable city! who, though thou hast been distinguished by Divine favours beyond any place on earth, yet with the utmost ingratitude and cruelty slayest the prophets, and stonest, as the vilest malfactors, those who are sent unto thee as the ambassadors of God! How often would I have gathered thy children together unto myself, with all the tenderness of parental love, and have sheltered, comforted, and cherished them, even as a hen [gathers] her little brood of chickens under her wings? Yet you were still regardless of the offers of my grace, and would not be persuaded to hearken to my call.

And the third day I shall be perfected.] Many suppose, and I think very reasonably, that our Lord is not to be understood as speaking exactly of three days, but of a little period of time: see Hos. vi. 2, and compare the original of Gen. xxxi. 2, Exod. iv. 10, Deut. xix. 4, Josh. iii. 4, i Sam. xix. 7, and i Chron. xi. 2, in all which places yesterday and the third day signifies lately, or a little while ago.—On this interpretation the word τριάντα, I shall be perfected, may refer to Christ's finishing the work of redemption, and being by death consecrated to his office as the great High-Priest and Captain of our Salvation; as the word is used Heb. i. 10, v. 8, 9, 10, vii. 27, 28.

b It cannot be supposed that a prophet, &c.] John the Baptist had lately perished in Galilee, so that the expression προφητῇ αὐτῷ can import no more than this verse con expresses, which Elmer has shewn to be its proper sense; (Elmer, Obscr. Vol. I. p. 242.—Drusius, Grotius, Knatchbull, and many other eminent critics refer this to the right which the Sanhedrim alone had to punish a person as a false prophet.

out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected.

33 Nevertheless I must walk to-day and to-morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem.

34 O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee: how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not?
25 Behold your house is left unto you desolate: and verily I say unto you, Ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. call and to accept my favour. And now, alas, behold with awful dread, and remark the prediction and event, your house is left unto you desolate; and the hour is just at hand, when your children, whom I would have gathered to myself, shall perish, and your temple shall be utterly destroyed: and in the mean time, I assuredly say unto you, That I will quickly cease my labours among you, and retire in such righteous displeasure, that you shall see me no more, till the time come when, taught by your calamities, you shall be ready and disposed to say, Blessed [be] he that cometh in the name of the Lord, and shall in vain wish for the succour of him whom you now despise. (Compare Mat. xxiii. 37—39, sect. clviii.)

IMPROVEMENT.

And who would not welcome such a Saviour, when he appears on Ver. so kind a design! who would not bless him that cometh in the name of the Lord, to gather our souls with the tenderest care and to shelter us from wrath and ruin! that Saviour, whose bowels yearned over us, and whose heart poured forth its blood for us! Too many reject him, and will not hearken to the kindest calls of his compassionate voice. Unhappy creatures! the time will come, when they too late will be convinced of their fatal error.

Let each of us be solicitous for himself. Away with those vain curiosities, which serve only to amuse and distract our thoughts. Let us call, and fix them down to the great concerns of our own salvation: and, if we would secure it, let us prepare to encounter difficulties, and strive, as for our lives, to break through all the opposition of our enemies, and resolutely to enter in at the strait gate. How many have sought it, when the door has been barred? and how soon may the great Master of the house arise and shut it for ever against those who are yet trifling!

i You shall see me no more, till—(you shall say, Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord.) Some supposing these words refer to the congratulations which Christ received on his entrance into Jerusalem, (Mat. xxv. 9. Mark xi. 10. Luke xix. 35. and John xii. 13. sect. cxliv.) urge them as a reason for placing this section after the 9th and 10th chapters of John, or between the feast of the dedication and his last passover. But, as our Lord repeats these words again, after his triumphant entry, (Mat. xiii. 39. sect. clviii.) they must be capable of another interpretation, and therefore can afford no such argument; nor is there any intimation of his return into Galilee between these two feasts.—It does not imply they should ever see Jesus at all; but only that they should earnestly wish for the Messiah, and, in the extremity of their distress, be ready to entertain any one who might offer himself under that character. Compare Luke xvii. 22, 23, sect. cxxviii. *
Let not hypocrites trust in vain words. The workers of iniquity shall be disowned by Christ at last, though they may have eaten and drunk in his presence. But oh, who can express the disappointment, the rage, and despair, of those who fall from such towering hopes, and plunge, as from the very gates of heaven, into the lowest abyss of darkness and horror! Their hearts will endeavour to harden themselves in vain; their doleful cries shall be distinguished in that region of universal horror! but they shall not penetrate the regions of the blessed, nor interrupt the delight, with which even the dearest of their pious relatives shall sit down in the kingdom of God.

If we through grace have more substantial hopes, let us imitate the zeal and courage of our Divine Leader; and, whatever threatenings or dangers may oppose, let us go on day after day, till our work be done, and our souls at length perfected in glory. But let us carefully distinguish between those things, in which our Lord meant himself as our Pattern, and those which were peculiar to his office as a Prophet sent from God. That extraordinary office justified him in using that severity of language, when speaking of wicked princes and corrupt teachers, to which we have no call; and by which we should only bring scandal on religion, and ruin on ourselves, while we irritated, rather than convinced or reformed, those whom we undertook so indecently to rebuke.

SECT. CXIX.

Our Lord being invited to dine with a Pharisee, cures a man who had a dropsy, cautions them against an affectation of precedence, and urges them to works of Charity. Luke XIV. 1—14.

LUKE XIV. I.

And it came to pass that just as our Lord was finishing his journey though Herod's dominions, he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees, who was a magistrate of great distinction,

* As he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees.] As all that follows from the beginning of this xiv. chapter to chap. xvii 10, is placed by Luke before the account of his journey through Samaria to Jerusalem; and, as I find no other event in any of the evangelists before the feast of dedication to which I conclude that journey refers, I am obliged (by the rule I lay down to myself of never changing the order without apparent reason) to take all these discourses and stories just as I find them; though I cannot pretend positively to say that Luke, who, no doubt, has sometimes changed the order in his narration, has exactly observed it here. It is however possible, that all recorded in these chapters might pass within the compass of a few days, and so would be consistent with interpreting chap. xiii. 32, 33, in a more literal manner than is absolutely necessary.

b A magistrate
Christ cures a man that had the dropsy.

2 And, behold, there was a certain man before him, which had the dropsy.

3 And Jesus, answering, spake unto the lawyers and Pharisees, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-day?

4 And they held their peace.—

—And he took him, and healed him, and let him go:

5 And answered them,

tinction, by whom he was invited to eat bread, that is, to dine with him on the sabbath-day; and many of the Pharisees were present there; and, as their usual custom was, they were narrowly watching him, to make the most invidious observations on his conduct.

And, behold, there was a certain man before him that had a dropsy, who, having heard that Jesus was to dine there, had conveyed himself thither, in hope of cure.

And Jesus answering to the secret reasonings which he discerned in their minds on this occasion, said to the doctors of the law and other Pharisees who were then present, What do you think now of this case? Is it lawful to heal a distempered person on the sabbath day? or can there be any thing in so benevolent an action inconsistent with the sacred rest which is required on that day?

But they were silent; as not being able, with any face, to deny the legality of the action, and yet unwilling to say any thing which might seem to authorize or countenance those cures which Christ performed on the sabbath-day as well as at other times; and which, in the general, they had been known to censure.

When Jesus therefore found that they would make him no reply, he extended his compassion to the poor man; and, taking him [by the hand], he miraculously healed him before them all, and dismissed him perfectly well, restored at once to his full strength, and reduced in a moment to his proper shape and bulk.

And, more fully to convince them how justifiable such an action was, even upon their own principles, b A magistrate of great distinction.] If (as Dr. Whitby supposes) the person who gave the invitation was indeed one of the grand sanhedron, he might nevertheless have a country seat in Galilee; as the higher courts never fail of allowing some recess to the members. So that Grotius's argument for transposing this story till Christ's arrival at Jerusalem seems inconclusive.

c Had conveyed himself thither, &c.] I cannot think (as some suppose) that he was one of the family: because it is said that Christ dismissed, or let him go, when he was cured; ver. 4.

d Taking him by the hand.] I know some have imagined that Christ led him aside to avoid ostentation: but the words do not express this; and, as our Lord speaks of the cure both immediately before and after it, there can be no room to imagine he intended to conceal it. Probably the circumstance of taking him by the hand is mentioned as an instance of his condescension; and shews that there was nothing in the manner of the cure which could be objected to as a servile work.

e Reduced to his proper shape and bulk.] If any ask how this could be, I answer, He that at once could cure the dropsy with a touch, could, if he please, annihilate the excess of water that caused it; and it is reasonable to believe the cure was wrought in such a manner as would make the reality and perfection of it immediately apparent.

principles, as he saw they were secretly cavilling at it, he said in answer to them, Which of you if he have but an ass or an ox, that shall happen to fall into a pit, will not immediately draw him out without any scruple, even on the sabbath-day; though that is a much more laborious action, and the life of one of those animals is so much less important than the health of a man? And can you then, without the greatest injustice, condemn me for what I have now done?

6 And they were all so confounded at the force and evidence of what he said, that they were not able to answer him again to these things, though they had not the candour to acknowledge themselves convinced by them.

7 And he spake what may in one sense of the word be called a parable, that is, a grave, concise, and memorable sentence (see note b, Vol. I. p. 339), to those who were invited to dinner, when he observed how they chose and contended for the chief seats at the table; and to reprove them for their pride, and recommend humility, he said unto them, There is one thing I would on this occasion address to every one in the company, namely, When thou art invited by any friend to a wedding-feast, or any other great entertainment, remember the hint which Solomon has given (Prov. xxv. 6, 7), and do not sit down in the uppermost place, lest another of more honourable rank in life than thee should happen to be invited by him. And he that invited you both should come and say to thee, Thou must give place to this person; and thou shouldst then, to avoid a second disgrace of this nature, begin with shame to take the very lowest place, as conscious how much thou hast exposed thyself by so haughtily and foolish a behaviour. But rather, on the contrary, when thou art thus invited, go and sit down at first in the lowest place thou canst find, that when he that invited thee comes into the room he may say to thee, My friend go up higher: then them, saying, Whichever you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the sabbath-day?

6 And they could not answer him again to these things.

7 And he put forth a parable to those which were bidden, when he marked how they chose out the chief rooms; saying unto them,

8 When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room; lest a more honourable man than thou be bidden of him;

9 And he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room.

10 But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he

If he have but an ass or an ox, &c.] Our Lord had used the same reason before, almost in the same words, when vindicating the cure of the man whose hand was withered (Mat. xii. 11, Vol. I. p. 273); and another time had urged an argument in effect the same with regard to the cure of the crooked woman: (Luke xiii. 13. sect. cxvii.) Which may serve, among a variety of other instances, to vindicate several repetitions which must be supposed, if we desire to assert the exact and circumstantial truth of the sacred historians.—See Walton's Miscell. Vol. II. p. 27.

g Sit down at first in the lowest place.] It is most probable that Christ himself, as illustrous a person as he was, had accordingly done thus, and sat down among them in the lowest place at the table.

b Invite
he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee.

11 For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

12 Then said he also to him that bade him, When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours; lest they also bid thee again, and a recompence be made.

14 And thou shalt be then shall thy modesty be followed with a distinguished reward, and thou shalt thus have honour in the sight both of the master of the feast and of all them that sit at table with thee, as having assumed nothing to thyself, but rather been contented to stoop to thine inferiors. For this may be laid down as a certain maxim in life, and happy is the man that attends to it, Every one who exalts himself beyond his proper rank and circumstances, shall be proportionably humbled and mortified; but he that willingly humbles himself shall be exalted and honoured, as well as beloved, both by God and man. (Compare Mat. xxiii. 12, and Luke xviii. 14.)

Then said he also to him that invited him, If you desire to improve what you have to the best advantage, spend it in charity, rather than in magnificence and luxury: and when thou makest a dinner or a supper, invite not so much thy rich friends, or thy brethren, or thy kindred, or neighbours; lest they should also invite thee again, and thus a recompence be made thee, and all thou hast in return be to receive one banquet for another; which would introduce an habit of high living, at a great expence both of money and time, and would occasion the disorder of your respective families. But rather, when thou wouldst make an entertainment which should turn to the surest account, let it be plain and frugal, and invite to it the poor, the disabled, the lame, and the blind, who are incapable of providing for themselves; let these come frequently to thy house, to receive thine alms; or send portions to them when they cannot come. (Neh. viii. 10.) And this will afford thee a much nobler satisfaction than banquets can give: and with them: for if these were in low circumstances, their being related to them was an argument why they should be regarded rather than neglected.

[1] The disabled, &c. We render αματαις; the maimed; but the signification of the word is much more extensive, and indeed takes in both the lame and the blind afterwards mentioned; and may also include those whom the infirmities of age have rendered helpless.—Grotius thinks this scripture was the foundation of the agape, or love-feasts, among the primitive christians; but it is not evident. Pliny has a fine parallel passage. See Plin. Epist. lib. ix. epist. 50.
Reflections on the exercise of humility and charity.

and I may truly say, thou shalt be happy in that they are not capable of making thee such a re-quital; for their prayers shall descend in blessings on thy head; and, besides all the pleasure a generous heart will find in the very exercise of such bounties, thou shalt be abundantly recomppensed at the resurrection of the just, if they proceed from a real principle of piety and faith. (Compare note on Vol. I. p. 289.)

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. 1. How happy were they, who had frequent opportunities of conversing with Christ, whose discourses were always so wise and so useful: how well did he repay all the entertainments he received, in the advantages which he gave for religious improvement! In vain might his enemies watch for occasions against him. In his tongue was the law of wisdom as well as of kindness, (Prov. xxxi. 26.) And surely the lips of his ministers and disciples would feed many to their everlasting benefit, were this blessed model to be more carefully traced! (Prov. x. 21.)

3, 11 Let us particularly observe, what he here says concerning a modest and humble deportment, which is indeed the surest way to be honoured and respected. And let us take great heed, that that good breeding, which consists so much in the expressions of humility and readiness to prefer others to ourselves, do not degenerate into a mere form, and prove, as it too often does, the cloak of arrogance and pride; but that it have its foundation in a lowly opinion of ourselves, and an habitual disposition to submit even to our inferiors, when we may do it without breaking in upon the duties and decencies of life, and injuring those to whom it may be exercised, by an indulgence which they know not how to understand or improve.

12, 13 Let us hearken to these exhortations to charity from the mouth of our charitable Saviour, who gave himself for us. And as Christ pleased not himself (Rom. xv. 3), let us not allow ourselves to squander away great quantities of money, in what may gratify our own senses, or make a gaudy shew in the eyes of the vainer part of mankind; but let us be willing to spare from the luxuries and superfluities of life, that we may bestow it on the poor and the distressed.

① At the resurrection of the just.] It is not so evident, as Dr. Clarke supposes, that these must here signify charitable mercy; it rather seems to me a strong and awaking intimation that none who neglect works of charity shall have their final lot among the righteous; which is evident from the many hundred scriptures which indispensably require mercy as well as justice. (Compare Mat. i. 18, note a, Vol. I. p. 51.)

distressed. And indeed, whatever our circumstances and possessions be, we must expect that the stream of our bounty will soon be dried up, if it be not supplied from the fountain of a prudent frugality. This self-denial may now in some instances be painful; but it will be amply recompensed at the resurrection of the just. 14 May we then meet with many, whom our liberality has fed and clothed, whom our knowledge and zeal have instructed, and whom our holy examples have edified and quickened! Here will be a foundation laid for the endearments of an eternal friendship; when that which has been formed upon a partnership in vice, or annual pleasure, shall be for ever forgotten, or be remembered with mutual horror.

SECT. CXX.

AND when one of them that sat at meat with him heard these things, he said unto him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. 16 Then said he unto him, A certain man made a great supper, and bade many.

AND while Jesus was thus discoursing, one of the guests at the Pharisee's table hearing these useful things, and willing to keep up so good a spirit of conversation, said to him, Happy indeed is he who shall be honoured so far as to eat bread in the kingdom of God: blessed man, who shall live in the time of the Messiah, and share the entertainments he will prepare for his people, when these virtues of humility, condescension, and charity, shall flourish in all their glory!

On this natural occasion, our Lord thought it proper to remind him and the company, that many who, on mistaken notions of this kingdom, professed to desire it, were under the force of such carnal prejudices on this head, that they would in fact slight and reject it. And to this purpose he uttered the following parable, and said to him that had expressed so high a notion of the entertainments of his kingdom, A certain man made a great supper, and invited many guests. And he sent out his servant at the hour of supper to say to those that were invited, as they

a Shall eat bread.] It is well known that the phrase, to eat bread, signifies making a meat; and this not merely at a common table, but sometimes at a feast, where the provision is very sumptuous. So perhaps it might be at the table of this noble Pharisee, ver. 1 (See 2 Sam. ix. 7, 10; xii. 17, 20; and Prov. ix. 5.) Compare note c. Vol. i. p. 440.

they delayed their coming, My master desires you would come away as soon as possible; for all things prepared for the entertainment are now ready. And they all began with one [consent] as if by mutual agreement they had all contrived to put a slight on the entertainment, to excuse themselves on one pretence or another. The first said to him that was sent, I have just now purchased a field, and I am under a necessity of going to see it; I entreat thee therefore to make my 19 excuse. And another said, I have just bought five yoke of oxen, and I am going to try them, that I may see how they will draw; I beseech thee therefore to make my excuse, and assure thy master that it is important business that prevents 20 me. And another said I have very lately married a wife, and shall have company to entertain, and therefore you will easily perceive I cannot come to attend your master's feast and 21 neglect my own. And that servant returning told his lord all these things. Then the master of the house who had made the entertainment was very angry, as he reasonably might be, to see such an affront put upon his splendid preparations, and such an ungrateful return made for the peculiar kindness and respect he had shewn in sending for these guests; and therefore he said to his servant, Go out directly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the disabled, and the blind, that they may come and partake of the entertainment;

b With one [consent]: and since all the various methods which learned men have taken to supply the ellipsis here (which may be seen at large in Wolfius, Observ. Vol. I. p. 692, 683), it seems to me most natural to understand the word

c I beseech thee make my excuse, &c.] It is a beautiful circumstance that our Lord here represents both these bargains as already made; so that going to see the farm and to prove the oxen, that evening rather than the next morning, was merely the effect of readiness on the one hand, and of a foolish impatient hurry on the other; and never could have been urged, had they esteemed the inviter, or his entertainment. Accordingly it is commonly found in fact, that men neglect the blessings and demands of the gospel, not for the most important affairs in life with which they seldom interfere, but to indulge the caprice and folly of their own temper, and to gratify the impulse of present passions sometimes excited on very low occasions.

d I cannot come, &c.] As the process of the parable represents a wise and good man offended with this excuse among the rest, we must suppose something in the circumstance of his receiving the message, or of appointing the time for entertaining company on his own marriage, which implied a rude contempt of the inviter, and made the reply indecent. It was not necessary to descend to such particulars.

e Into the streets and lanes of the city.] This seems the true distinction between making and going; the former of which signifies a broad, and the latter a narrow way, in which last the alleys may be included.

ment; for I had rather see my house filled with such guests than empty as it now is. And the servant quickly came back, and said, Sir, what thou didst please to command, is done; these poor distressed people are come in, and sat down at the table; and still there is room for more guests, and entertainment enough provided to feast many others. And the lord said to the servant, 23 Go out then into the roads without the city, and, rather than fail, look for the poorest and most helpless travellers, who are sheltering themselves under trees and hedges; and, if importunity be necessary to such, press them that you find there by the most earnest invitation to come in, that my house may be well filled. For I say unto you, 24 that none of those men who were invited, if they should now be ever so desirous of it, shall be admitted so much as to taste of my supper; since they have so rudely and ungratefully slighted it.

And in like manner, such will the Divine conduct be with regard to the gospel. God sends his messengers in the most important manner to invite you Jews to come and partake of its rich entertainment; yet you neglect it on the meanest pretences, and one is too busy, and another too idle, to attend to it. But he will severely resent the affront, and (though it may seem to you as unaccountable a conduct as that which I have represented in this parable) will call in the poor, ignorant, and wretched Gentiles, who were wandering in the most helpless circumstances, f Into the roads and hedges.] Any gross and abandoned sinners might be represented as in this wretched condition. (See Eph. ii. 12—17.) But it seems an excessive refinement of Breunius, to suppose the hedges here mentioned refer to the ceremonial law as a partition; as it likewise is to explain the first clause as relating to the prospectes of the gate, and the second to the odious Gentiles. One might as well infer from ver. 24 that no Jews should be saved; and it argues a wrong taste in criticism to torture every circumstance into a fancied resemblance.

g Press them by the most earnest invitation to come in.] Nothing can be more apparently weak than to imagine, with St. Augustin and many others, that these words can justify the use of compulsion and force in religious matters; the absurdity and injustice of which I have represented at large in my sermon on that subject. It is certain the word APPLY is often used to express an importunity where there could be no secular terrors: Mat. xiv. 22. Mark vi. 45. Gal. ii. 3. 14. vi. 14. (as is likewise the word ζητεομενοι, Luke xxiv. 29. and Acts xvi. 15.) and several instances are produced by Elsner, in which the word signifies pressing persuasion, (Observ. Vol. i. p. 244, 245.) And here, as it would be most indecent to imagine persons forced to an entertainment, so it would have been quite, impracticable for a single servant to have compelled a multitude in this sense. There is an ambiguity in the English word [press], which much more exactly answers to that in the original, than the word our translators use; and it seems to me the part of a faithful translator, especially of the sacred writings, to preserve the ambiguities of the original; though a paraphrase, which speaks only a man's own sentiments, may sometimes venture to determine them.
Reflections on the invitations given us to the gospel feast.

Ver. May the infinite mercy of God forbid, that this should ever be our condition! The gospel-feast, like the sumptuous banquet of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 3, 4,) is of a very long standing; not only from week to week, but from age to age, God is sending to invite new guests: and, after all the millions that have been regaled by it, and nourished up to everlasting life, there is yet room for more. Still are his servants sent from one time to another, with all the fervor of the most affectionate persuasion, to urge sinners to accept of these desirable blessings; (for such only is the compulsion that becomes a feast, and suits the nature of reasonable creatures.) May we not receive the grace of God in vain! May we not perish, as thousands before us have done, by making light of the gospel!

It has often been observed from this parable, that they were lawful occasions which these unhappy people pleaded as their excuse for neglecting the invitation. And how many perish by what is indeed lawful! But the care of our estates or cattle, our domestic affairs, and our dearest relatives, will be destructive to us, if they be minded as our main care, and our hearts be so attentive to them as to forget the one thing needful.

Are we of the number of those who, though once blinded, impoverished and enfeebled by sin, are now brought as welcome guests to the table, which Divine love has spread? Let us adore the grace which opened the door to us, and opened our hearts to comply with the call; by its strong and powerful, though rational and gentle influence, compelling us to come in. Let the servants employed in the message urge it with a becoming earnestness; as well knowing, how much the heart of their great master is in it, and how much the happiness of souls depends on their accepting it. Lord! may we see thy table furnished with guests, and ourselves be so happy as finally to partake of those blessings, to which we are now commanded to invite others! For blessed indeed are they, who shall eat bread in the kingdom of God!
Religion must be undertaken with serious consideration.

SECT. CXXI.

Our Lord urges upon his disciples the necessity of considering the difficulties of religion before they take up a profession of it. Luke XIV. 25, to the end.

LUKE XIV. 25.

And as great multitudes attended Christ; and went with him in this his journey toward Jerusalem, he turned about and said to them, You now attend me from place to place with some tokens of regard; but seriously consider how much it will cost you to approve yourselves my faithful followers.

If any one comes to me to be instructed in my religion, and to obtain the blessings of my kingdom, and does not prepare himself, on a proper occasion, to act as if he did even hate his father and mother, and his very wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.

And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple.

For which of you intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and considerest not what he must needs to build, and what he hath to spend, and how he shall find the materials? for he that is not ready will do foolishly.

Great multitudes attended Christ. Perhaps the cure of the man who had the dropsy, and some expectations as to the event of Christ's visit to this Pharisee, might cause a crowd near his house; and what follows might be spoken the same sabbath, on our Lord's coming out from thence: but as the evangelist does not so expressly connect the passages, I was not willing to assert it in the paraphrase.

To act as if he even did hate his father and mother, &c. Strictly speaking, to hate our nearest relatives, and our own lives, would be unnatural wickedness, and equally contrary to the dictates of humanity and the genius of the gospel. But it is well known that one thing is said to be loved and another hated in scripture, when the former is much preferred; and especially when, out of regard to it, the latter is neglected and forsaken. Compare Gen. xxi. 15—17. Mal. i. 3. Rom. ix. 13, and Mat. vi. 24.

If he intend to build a tower. This phrase naturally suggests to us the idea of a more magnificent edifice than our Lord's heavers might probably think of on this occasion. It is plain that these were frequently run up, probably of some slight materials, to lodge those who had the care of other edifice, does not first deliberately sit down and compute the expense it will require, and compare it with his own circumstances, that he may judge whether he has a stock of wealth [sufficient] to finish it? Lest when he hath laid a foundation, and is not able to complete [the work] he had begun, for want of money to go through with it, all who see it, as they pass by, should begin to deride him, saying, in contempt, This must be surely a wise man, who thus began to build, and was not able to finish his plan; and here his imperfect work stands a lasting monument of his great discretion!

31 Or what wise king, if he was marching out to encounter another king in war, does not first sit down and consider whether he has any such advantage, as to arms, strength or situation, as may induce him to conclude that he is able with no greater force than ten thousand men to meet and oppose him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? And if he find he has not, while he that comes with this superior force against him is yet at a distance, he sends an embassy, and desires terms of peace; acknowledging his readiness to submit to some things which may be disagreeable, for the preservation of his dominions, and perhaps of his life.

33 So then do you consider, whether you think it worth your while to adhere to me on these terms; for I assure you, I will admit you on no other; and whosoever he be of you that does not steadfastly resolve of keeping vineyards or flocks; and they were built pretty high in proportion to their basis, that they might command the larger prospect. Compare 2 Chron. xxvi. 10. Mic. iv. 8. Isa. v. 2. Mat. xxi. 33. and Mark xii. 1.

4 Or what king marching out to encounter another king, &c.] According to Sir Isaac Newton's chronology, these words were spoken at our Lord's last passover, and might refer to Herod's leading his army through Judea against Aretas king of Arabia. But as Herod did not then appear to be the weaker, I cannot see that (even supposing the premises to be true) there would be any certainty of such an intended allusion.

5 Desires terms of peace: .Elapsed to assuage: pacific.] This represents the feeblest person as begging a peace; a proper emblem of the humility and resignation with which peace is to be sought from an offended God, who is possessed of a strength, not (as in the case supposed here) merely double, but infinitely superior to ours.—The pious and amiable author of a late valuable piece called Orthodoxy and Charity (whosoever he be) has given a quite different interpretation of this passage, which, so far as I can recollect, I have not yet seen, and which I am sure deserves consideration. He explains it (p. 43) as referring to those who have not courage to fight with their spiritual enemies, the world, the flesh, and the devil, and therefore make the best terms they can with them, and sit still neglecting Christ and religion. But if the passage be taken in this sense, our Lord, by declaring in the next verse that he will make no abatement in his own demands, plainly intimates how necessary it is to break through all opposition, and to determine to face all the difficulties in our way, which it will be our wisdom to view and consider, that we may be prepared with proportionable resolution.
he hath, he cannot be my disciple.

34 Salt is good: but if the salt have lost its savour, when shall it be seasoned?

35 It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill; but men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

resolve to give up all his possessions, whenever he is called to it on my account, he cannot be owned by me as my disciple indeed.

And if you are not my disciples indeed, your outward profession will be very insignificant; for though salt in general is a very good thing, and my servants, as I formerly intimated (Mat. v. 13. Vol. I. p. 203), are the salt of the earth; yet I must again add, if the salt be grown insipid, with what can it be seasoned? or what can recover those whom my gospel will not influence and reclaim? And as insipid salt is such a vile and worthless thing, that it is neither fit to be used of itself as a manure for the land, nor even so much as fit for a place on the dunghill to be there mixed with other dung; [but] it is thrown out of doors, and trampled under foot like mire in the streets: you also will be no less useless and contemptible, if, under the advantages and obligations of a Christian profession, you are destitute of a sincere principle of integrity and piety, and will be utterly abandoned and rejected as unprofitable servants. He therefore that hath ears to hear, let him hear it attentively; for it is a point in which notonly the honour of my kingdom, but the salvation of your own souls is concerned.

IMPROVEMENT.

MAY our most serious attention be fixed on so important a Ver. truth; and may this plain and candid declaration of our Lord be duly regarded by us, as ever we desire to find the advantage of that relation to him in which we are so ready to glory! If we would not be cast out with disdain, and trampled under foot as worthless and vile, let us be solicitous that there may be the salt of Divine grace in our hearts; and let us undertake a religious profession with that deliberate consideration, which becomes a matter of such great importance. A hasty purpose will never bear us through the difficulties we must expect to encounter; and rash vows and thoughtless adventures, in this case, will only expose us to the derision of others, and the keener remorse of our own minds.

Nor is the nature and evidence of religion such, as to have any reason to fear the severest examination. The demands of Christ are indeed high; that the nearest relatives should be abandoned, and even life itself sacrificed for his sake; that we be at least mar-

Did he leave his Father's bosom for us, and shall we scruple to abandon our houses and our kindred for him? Did he expire on the cross: for us, and shall not we be ready to take up our crosses and follow him? Shall it not be delightful to us to trace his most painful steps, and by the most costly sacrifices to approve our gratitude and our duty?*

Blessed Jesus, lead us! and by thy grace we will follow thee, whatever be the path, whatever be the burden, whatever the terror of the way; knowing that if we partake with thee in thy sufferings, we shall at length share with thee in thy consolation and thy glory!* (2 Tim. ii. 12.)

Publicans and sinners flock round our Lord, and he vindicates his readiness to receive them by the parables of the lost sheep and piece of money. Luke XV. 1—10.

THUS our Lord addressed himself to the multitude, and especially to his disciples, on the sabbath-day, as he came out from the house of the noble Pharisee with whom he had dined: now it was then a season of leisure, and he appeared in public teaching the people, all the publicans in that place, and some other notorious sinners, who might not easily have been admitted into the Pharisee's house, drew near to hear him preach, being charmed with the condescension which allowed of their access. And Jesus, moved with compassion for them uttered some remarkable discourses, admirably calculated for their encouragement, and that of others,

A All the publicans and sinners drew near to hear him. Some suppose they came by a particular appointment from all the neighbouring parts. But as Luke goes on in the story, without any intimation of a change either in the time or the scene of it, I am inclined to think these discourses might be delivered the same day that Christ dined with the Pharisee, (sect. cxx.) which being the sabbath-day, would give the publicans, who on other days were employed in their office, a more convenient opportunity of attending.—Some have concluded (I could never conjecture for what reason) that this happened in Galilee of the Gentiles beyond Jordan, from whence, they say, Christ went up to Jerusalem (Luke xvii. 17.) But that the chief part of this assembly were Gentile idolators, can never be proved; and if it could, it would be no sufficient proof of Christ's being now on the other side of Jordan. Yet I acknowledge it highly probable, that some idolatrous Gentiles might join with the multitude, who, if they understood these parables, might justly draw great encouragement from them.

3 And he spake this parable unto them, saying,

4 What man of you having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it?

5 And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing:

6 And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost.

7 I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance.

3 And he spake this parable unto them, saying,

4 What man of you having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it?

5 And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing:

6 And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost.

33 others, who had lain under the most aggravated guilt. But the proud Pharisees and scribes, who were present, murmured when they saw such a crowd around him, and said, This man, while he sets up for a religious Teacher, unaccountably gives access to the most profligate sinners, and sometimes eats with them, and makes no scruple to accept of invitations to their houses. (Compare Mark ii. 16. Vol. I. p. 372.)

But [Jesus] for the encouragement of these 3 poor penitents, as well as to rebuke the censorious and uncharitable Pharisees, spake to them this parable, and said, What man is there of you that has a flock of an hundred sheep, who will not, upon loosing one of them, immediately leave the ninety-nine that were feeding together in the pastures of the desert, and go from place to place in search after that which was lost, till he find it? And having at length found it, he lays it on his shoulders, greatly rejoicing, as a man in such a circumstance naturally would: (compare Mat. xviii. 12, 13, sect. xciv. Vol. I. p. 494.) And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, and says unto them with the greatest pleasure, My friends, you may now rejoice with me; for my labour and search have not been in vain, but I have found my sheep which was lost. And as he thus is more delighted with the recovery of the sheep which he had lost, than with the safety of the rest, which had not wandered; so, I say unto you, that greater and more sensible joy will be in heaven, among the blessed and benevolent spirits that dwell there; over one penitent sinner, than over ninety-nine righteous persons who do not need such deep repentance, or such an universal change of mind and character.
Reflections on the joy in heaven over a penitent sinner.

Or, to illustrate the matter by another obvious similitude, that it may yet more powerfully strike your minds, What poor woman having ten pieces of silver money, though they were each of them but the value of a drachma, if she lose one of them out of her little stock, will not presently light a lamp and take the pains to sweep out the house, and search carefully in all the corners till she find it? And when she has found it, she joyfully calls her female friends and neighbours together, to acquaint them with her good success; and concluding it will be agreeable news to them, she says, Rejoice with me, my friends for I have found the piece of money which I had lost. And, so I say unto you, that there is in like manner a peculiar joy in heaven, among the angels of God over one repenting sinner. Do not therefore wonder if I labour to promote their joy on this account, and converse to familiar converse with those, whom you proudly despise as unworthy your regard.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. 1. How graceful and lovely does our Lord appear, while thus opening his compassionate arms and heart, to these wretched out-casts, for whose souls no man cared! Who can choose but rejoice at this jubilee, which he proclaimed among them, and at the cheerful attention which they gave to these glad tidings of great joy? May we, who are his followers, never despise the meanest or the worst of men, when they seem disposed to receive religious instruction;

sins, &c.] It cannot be our Lord's meaning here, that God esteems one penitent sinner more than ninety-nine contrite and established saints (who are, undoubtedly, the persons spoken of as needing no repentance, or no universal change of heart and life, in which sense the word sufficiently is commonly used,) for it would be inconsistent with the Divine wisdom, goodness, and holiness, to suppose this. But it is plainly as if he said, "As a father peculiarly rejoices when an extravagant child is reduced to a sense of his duty, and one whom he had considered as utterly ruined by his follies, and perhaps as dead, returns with remorse and submission; or as any other person who has recovered what he had given up for gone, has a more sensible satisfaction in it than in several other things equally valuable, but not in such danger: so do the holy inhabitants of heaven rejoice in the conversion of the most abandoned sinners, and the great Father of all so readily forgives and receives them, that he may be represented as having part in the joy."—Though, by the way, when human passions are ascribed to God, it is certain they are to be taken in a figurative sense, entirely exclusive of those sensations which result from the commotions of animal nature in ourselves.

6 She calls her female friends [τις φίλοις] and neighbours together.] It might seem hardly worth while to ask the congratulation of her friends on so small an occasion as finding a drachma, (for that is the piece of coin here mentioned, in value not above ninepence,) but it is represented as the tenth part of her little stock, and the impressive and social temper of the sex may be perhaps thought of as adding some propriety to the representation.
The parable of the prodigal son.

Instruction; bat rather exert ourselves with a distinguished zeal, as knowing that the joy of the heavenly world in their recovery will be in some measure proportionable to the extremity of their former danger.

Let us often recollect the charity and goodness of those per- fected spirits, who look down from their own glory with compassion on mortals wandering in the paths of the destroyer, and who sing anthems of thankfulness and joy, when by Divine grace they are reclaimed from them. Let every sinner be touched with a generous desire, that he who has been in so many instances the offence and burden of the earth, may become the joy of heaven by his sincere conversion. And let the solicitude with which the little pos- 4, 6 sessions of this world are sought, when they are lost by any accident, engage us more earnestly to seek what is infinitely more valuable, our own salvation, and that of the immortal souls of others. May we in our different stations labour successfully for their recovery; that we may another day share in that higher joy, which angels and glorified saints shall express, when they see them not only reduced to the paths of virtue and happiness, but fixed in abodes of eternal glory!

SECT. CXXIII.

Our Lord farther pursues the design of the preceding parables, by delivering that of the prodigal son. Luke XV. 11, to the end.

AND he said, A certain man had two sons:

12 And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living.

WITH the same design of vindicating himself in conversing with publicans and sinners, of reproving the envy of the Pharisees, and of encouraging every sincere penitent by moving representations of the Divine mercy, our Lord went on to utter another most beautiful and affecting parable. And he said, while this various multitude was standing round him, There was a certain man in plentiful circumstances, and of a very condescending temper, who had two sons that were now grown up to manhood. And the younger of them, fondly conceited of his own capacity to manage his affairs, and weary of the restraints of his father's house, said one day to his indulgent parent, Father, as I am now come to years of discretion, I desire thou wouldst give me into mine own hands that portion of goods, which, according to an equitable distribution, falls to my share. And he, unwilling to make any invidious distinction in distributing his his effects, divided his living between them both, and gave them his chief stock of money, reserving the house and estate in his own hands.

And not many days after this division was made, the younger son gathering all his treasure together, and pretending a design of trafficking with it, took a journey into a very distant country; and there forgetting his relations at home, and living with a knot of companions like himself, in a very riotous, debauched, and extravagant manner, he quickly squandered away the whole of his substance.

14 And when he had consumed all in this wretched course, it so happened, through the righteous judgment of God upon him, that there was an extreme famine in that country where he so-journed; and he soon began to be in want of the very necessaries of life. And, finding no shelter or relief among those who had been the companions of his luxury, and shared in the spoils of his substance, yet unable to brook the mortification of returning home in such circumstances, he went and joined himself as a servant to a citizen of that place; who, thinking such a worthless creature unfit for any better post, sent him away into his grounds belonging to an estate in the country, where he employed him to feed swine: to which, however mean and disagreeable the employment was, this unhappy youth, who had once lived in so much plenty and splendour, was forced to submit: And even then, through the unkindness of his master, and the extremity of the season, he was kept so poorly that he had not bread; but would gladly have filled his hungry belly with the sorriest hawks which the swine did eat:

a Divided his living between them both.] It is plain, no significant sense can be put on this circumstance of the parable, as referring to the dispensations of God to his creatures. It is one of those many ornamental circumstances, which it would be weakness over-rigorously to accommodate to the general design.

b Who—sent him into his grounds.] That xat, in such a construction, should be rendered in this manner, the accurate Elsner has shown by a variety of convincing instances. (Observ. Vol. I. p. 248.)

c However mean and disagreeable the employment was.] It is true, that among the ancient Greeks, the chief swineherd was looked upon as an officer of no considerable rank; as evidently appears from the figure which Eumaeus makes in the Odyssey: but this was an age of greater refinement; the unhappy youth was obliged to tend the swine himself; and if he be considered as a Jew, the aversion of that nation for this unclean animal must render the employment peculiarly odious to him; and probably this circumstance was chosen by our Lord to represent him as reduced to the most vile and servile state that could be imagined.

d With the sorriest hawks.] A late translation (after Brown, Saubert, Grotius, and many others) renders κρατοῦντα καταβρύξας, or the fruit of the carob-tree, which bore a mean, though sweetish kind of fruit, in long crooked pods; which by some is called St. John’s bread; but if the account which Saubert 13 And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living.

14 And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want.

15 And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine.

16 And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat; and no man gave unto him, Awakened at last to a sense of his folly, he returns home.

17 And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!

18 I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, 19 And am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants.

20 And he arose, and came to his father.

Savoir himself gives of it be true, swine would hardly have been fed with any thing but the husky part of this, in a time of extreme famine. I therefore chose to retain our version; but take it, on the whole, to have been the fruit of a tree something of a wild chestnut kind. See Drusius in loc.

e Sinced against the great God of heaven.] This was, as Dr. Goodman observes (Parable of the Prodigal, p. 207), an acknowledgment that his father's yoke had been so easy, that his throwing it off had been an act of rebellion against God:

and it shewed also that his heart was touched with a sense, not only of the folly but the guilt of his conduct, and that the fear of God began to take hold of him.

[Make me as one of thine hired servants.] He mentions this, not because such servants fared worse than slaves; but because he was himself an hired servant, and therefore naturally compared his own condition with those of that rank in his father's family.

Providence taking care for his subsistence, though he was obliged to beg his way; and at length he came to the neighbourhood of the house in which his father dwelt.

But while he was yet at a considerable distance, his father, who happened to be then looking that way, saw him, and presently knew him, disguised as he was; and his bowels yearned over him, to see him in so wretched a condition: and immediately, as if he had forgot the dignity of his own character, and all the injuries he had received, he ran to his child, and fell on his neck with an eager embrace, and tenderly kissed him with tears of joy. And the son began to make his humble acknowledgments, as he before had proposed, and said unto him, O my abused and injured father, I am ashamed to appear in thy presence; for such has been my vileness, that I have sinned against the God of heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called and owned as thy son, or to receive any token of thy favourable regards. But, before he could make an end of the speech he intended, the compassionate father turned, and said to his servants, who were now gathered round them, Go immediately into the house, and bring out the best robe that is there, and clothe him with it, and put a ring on his hand, and sandals on his feet, that my dear child may appear like himself:

And let others of you run to the stall, and bring hither the fatted calf that is there, and kill it for a festival entertainment; and let us eat and be cheerful: For I esteem this as one of the happiest days of my life, and more joyful than the birth-day of one of my children; since this my son, that was so long considered by me as dead is returned to life; and he who was

But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him; and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him.

21 And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son.

22 But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet:

23 And bring hither the fatted calf and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry:

24 For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and

The best robe.] It is observed by Ferrarius (de Re Vestiaria, lib. iii. cap. 24.) that the robe, or long robe, was a garment which servants never wore; so that his father's ordering any such garment, and especially the best, to be brought, was declaring, in the most moving manner that can be imagined, how far he was from intending to treat him like a servant.—His mentioning the ring and shoes spake the same language; as many learned writers have observed. See Wofius in loc.

The fatted calf, and kill it.] Elsner would render the word έζώσα, sacrifice it; truly urging that it was customary to offer a sacrifice at the birth, and sometimes at the unexpected recovery, of a child. (See Elsner, Observ. p. 249, 250.) But no such sacrifice was appointed among the Jews, nor could any have been lawfully offered but at Jerusalem, which does not appear to have been the scene of this parable: so that I can see no just reason for such a rendering.

That was dead, is restored to life.] It is by a very common and beautiful emblem that vicious persons are represented as dead, both by sacred and profane authors (compare 1 Tim. v. 6. Eph. ii. 1. v. 14. and Wofius in loc.) and the natural death of

and is found. And they began to be merry.

25 Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing.

26 And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant?

27 And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound.

28 And he was angry, and would not go in:

—Therefore came his father out, and entreated him.

29 And he answering, said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment, and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends.

30 But as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf.

concluded to be irrecoverably lost, is found, so that I have renewed hope of comfort in him. And the whole house was filled with joy; and, having made the entertainment ready, they began to be cheerful. But while the younger son was thus received, into his father's house, his elder son was abroad in the field; and as on his return he approached the house, he heard the sound of music and dancing, and was surprised at the discovery of such unusual joy. And calling one of the servants to come to him, he inquired of him what was the meaning of these things, and what could have occasioned this extraordinary rejoicing? And he said to him, It is, because thy younger brother is comehome; and thy father is so transported with joy at his unexpected return, that he has killed the fatted calf, and made a very splendid entertainment, because he has received him in good health again, and found him happily recovered to a sense of his duty. And he was very angry at the kind reception of his brother, and resolved that he would not go in. His father therefore hearing he was there, and being told he had discovered some uneasiness, came out with great condescension, and calmly entreated him to be pacified, and to join with them in the festivities of the day. But, instead of rejoicing on so happy an occasion, and running to embrace his penitent brother, he was still full of envy and resentment, and replied to his father, Behold, I have served thee these many years, and even to this day am as careful of thy affairs as if thou wast my master, rather than my father; nor canst thou say I have at any time departed from my duty, or transgressed thy command; and yet thou hast never given me so much as a kid, that I might make an entertainment with a few of my select friends: But as soon as ever this thy favourite son was come, who has, as much as in him lay, devoured thy substance with harlots abroad, in a long course of scandalous debaucheries, to his own ruin, and the infamy of thy family, thou hast
He is told by his father how it was to rejoice.

And, though his father justly might have taken offence at his unbecoming reply, yet, with great gentleness, he said to him, Son, thou art always with me, and art every day receiving some token of my kindness; yea, all that I have is in a manner thine, as thou art heir to the bulk of my estate: But surely, on farther consideration, thou must acknowledge that it was fit we should feast and rejoice to-day; for this thy poor brother, who was but lately looked upon as dead, is, as it were, miraculously made alive again: and he who was lost to us all, is now happily found; and it will much better become thee to join with us in joy for his return, than thus peevishly to quarrel with my indulgence to him.

Now you, who have heard this parable, will easily see how indecent this conduct was, and how ungracious a figure this elder brother makes in my story. And I will assure you, that when you Pharisees murmur at the kindness shown to the publicans, or even the Gentiles themselves, on their sincere repentance, you act with as ill a grace, and are the objects of still greater blame, in proportion to the degree in which men's eternal interest are more important than those that relate merely to the present state.

All that I have is thine.] This is a material intimation, and suggests a strong recollection to the ear of murmuring at the indulgence shown to great sinners; for as the joyful welcome that the father gave this younger son did not incline him to disinherit the elder brother, so neither will God, out of a partial fondness for remarkable penitents, raise them to a state of glory superior to that of those who have on the whole made a greater progress in holiness, and done him more constant and faithful services.

This thy brother.] There is a lovely opposition between this and the 50th verse: the elder son had there indecently said, This thy son; the father in his reply tenderly says, This thy brother. And it is a moving intimation that the best of men ought to look upon the most abandoned sinners as in some respect their brethren still; and should especially remember the relation, when there appears any inclination to return.

To the publicans, or even the Gentiles themselves.] Many commentators have considered this parable in a view of peculiar application to the Jews and Gentiles; and have observed that the murmurs of the Jews against the apostles for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles (see Acts xiii. 32—50; xxii, 21, 22; and I Thes. ii. 16) are represented by the conduct of the elder brother.—This was certainly a case comprehended in our Lord's design; but he undoubtedly had something more in his intention. He meant to shew, that had the Pharisees been as eminently good as they themselves pretended to be, yet it had been very unworthy their character to take offence at the kind treatment which any sincere penitent might receive. Thus does he here, and in many parallel texts, condemn their conduct on their own principles; though elsewhere, on proper occasions, he shows the falsehood of those principles, and plainly exposes their hypocrisy and guilt. Thus the judicious Calvin states the matter; and it is strange so many learned writers should have puzzled themselves and their readers in so clear a case.
IMPROVEMENT.

Let us here behold, with all due attention, the moving representation which our gracious Redeemer makes of the folly of sinners, and the compassions of God; compassions, which he describes, as one who himself felt them, and who in this respect, as well as others, was the express image of his Father.

We have before us in this parable a lively emblem of the character and condition of sinners in their fallen state. They are thus impatient of the most necessary restraints, thus fondly conceived of their own wisdom; and thus, when enriched by the bounties of the great common Father, do they ungratefully run from him, and say unto God, Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways; (Job xxi. 14.) Sensual pleasures are eagerly sought; and perhaps all their earthly possessions and hopes are quickly paid as the price of them. While the means of obtaining these pleasures continue, not a serious thought of God can find a place in their minds: and then, perhaps, afflictions, heavy and complicated afflictions, come upon them; yet even under that pressure they will often make very hard shifts before they will be persuaded to think of a return; till at length Divine grace, working in concurrence with Providence, brings them to a better temper.

When they see themselves naked and indigent, enslaved and undone; when they come to themselves, and recover the exercise of their reason, improving it to the only purposes for which it would have been worth while to have received it;—then they feel the pangs of penitential remorse; then they remember the blessings they have lost, and attend to the misery they have incurred. And hereupon they are disposed humbly to confess their folly, and to prostrate themselves in the presence of their heavenly Father; they put the resolution immediately into practice; they arise and go unto him.

But oh, let us behold with wonder and pleasure the gracious reception they find from Divine injured goodness! He sees them afar off; he pities, he meets, and embraces them; he interrupts their complaints and acknowledgments with tokens of his returning favour. Is Ephraim my dear son? is he a pleasant child? for since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still: therefore my bowels are troubled for him; I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord; (Jer. xxxi. 20.) Thus does God welcome the humble penitent: thus does he open the arms of his love to embrace him, and the treasures of his bounty to enrich him.
Christ delivers the parable of the unjust steward.

him. He arrays him with the robe of a Redeemer's righteousness; dresses him in the ornaments of sanctifying grace, honours him with the tokens of adopting love, and invests him with the glorious privileges and immunities of his children. And all this he does with unutterable delight: he rejoices over him with joy; he rests in his love, and, as it were, rejoices over him with singing (Zeph. iii. 17;) and this is the joyful language of the song, My children that were dead, are alive again; and though they were lost, they are found.

25, 32 Let heaven and earth unite in the joy, and echo back the song. Let no elder brother murmur at the indulgence with which these prodigals are treated; but rather welcome them back into the family, and even encourage every thing that looks like a disposition to return to it. And let those who have been thus received, wander no more; but rather let them emulate the strictest piety of those, who for many years have served their heavenly Father, without having in any notorious instances transgressed his commandments.

Sect. CXXIV.

Christ delivers the parable of the unjust steward, and reproves the Pharisees for their covetousness and hypocrisy. Luke XVI. 1—18.

Our Lord then spake another parable, by which he intended to convince his hearers of the necessity of making a right use of their worldly enjoyments; and, having before rebuked the Pharisees for their envious and uncharitable temper, he said also to his disciples that were about him, There was a certain rich man who had a steward, in whom he had long put great confidence; and he was at last accused to him, as having wasted his goods which had been intrusted to his care. And calling him, he said unto him, What is this strange account that I hear of thee? Can it be true that thou hast acted so unjust and base a part? Give an immediate and exact account of thine administration and management in this office; for thou canst be no longer steward, with any honour to thyself, or satisfaction to me, while thou continuest under such imputations and suspicions as these.

And upon this, as might be well imagined, the steward was much alarmed, and said within himself,
What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: I cannot dig, to beg I am ashamed.

4 I am resolved what to do, that when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses.

5 So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord?

6 And he said, An hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty, a I am not able to dig, or to apply myself to—husbandry.] Raphelius (Annot. ex N. B. C. 104, 103), and Eslser (Observ. Vol. i. p. 251), have shewn that the word "exsauri" signifies, in general, to cultivate the land, and especially to prepare it for seed; which was one of the most laborious parts of the husbandman's work in which day-labourers were employed; and consequently most fit to be mentioned by this steward, who, having been used to a delicate and luxurious way of living, would naturally think of such a change of life in the most discouraging view. The expression ex

b An hundred baths of oil.] The Greek word βαθρος is evidently derived from the Hebrew בתר, which we render baths in the Old Testament. (1 Kings vii. 26. 2 Chron. ii. 10. Ezra vii. 22.) According to Bishop Cumberland it contained about seven gallons, two quarts, and half a pint. Compare Joseph. Antiq. lib. vili. cap. 2. § 9.—The measure of wheat, νους, in the Hebrew סנה, cor, or homer of the Hebrews, containing about eight bushels and an half, Winchester measure. The word homer being familiar to an English ear, I have retained it in the version. This homer contains ten ephahs, or baths (Ezek. xiv. 11, 14,) and each of these latter ten omers (Exod. xvi. 36). Twenty homers, which he allowed the debtor to deduct, would on this computation contain 170 bushels of wheat, and might be as valuable as fifty baths, or about 578 gallons of oil; so that the obligation conferred on both these debtors might be equal.

c Take thy bill, in which thou hast acknowledged the receipt of it, and sit down directly, and write another, another, in which thou shalt acknowledge the receipt of but fifty, and I will alter my book agreeable to that. Then he said to another, And how much dost thou owe? And he said, An hundred homers of wheat. And he says to him, Take thy bill back, and write down an acknowledgment of but fourscore; and remember how easy I have made thine account.

8 And when the master heard of it, though he could not but be sensible that it was an act of great injustice, yet he praised the unjust steward, as having done prudently however, and found out an artful expedient for his subsistence, by making friends, who might shelter him for the present, and perhaps recommend him to some new trust, in hopes of sharing again in the spoils of his dishonesty. And thus, said the blessed Jesus when he had concluded the parable, the children of this world are wiser in their way and generation, that is, they generally act a more prudent part with respect to their secular interests, than even those who may be called the children of light, or than good men themselves, who are enlightened by God to see where their true happiness lies, do with respect to theirs, which are so much more important (compare John xii. 36. 1 Thes. v. 5. and Eph. v. 8.) for they seldom appear so thoughtful and active in the great concerns of religion as worldly men are in pursuit of the momenty and precarious possessions of this present life.

9 And I also say to you, Endeavour to make yourselves sure friends with these riches which may not improperly be called the unrighteous or deceitful mammon (as so little confidence can be

he would have let the account remain unaltered. But by the exchange of bills he cunningly made each of the debtors an accomplice with him in defrauding his lord, and thereby provided against a discovery.

7 Then said he to another, And how much owest thou? And he said, An hundred measures of wheat. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and write fourscore.

8 And the lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely: for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light.

9 And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that when thou shalt fail, they may receive thee into everlasting homes.

mammon of unrighteousness; that when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations.

10 He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much.

11 If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?

12 And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?

13 No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

14 And the Pharisees also, who were covetous,

That when you fail, and die out of this world, they may receive you into everlasting habitations, and you may for ever enjoy the reward of your pious charity and love, in an everlasting friendship with all those truly worthy persons who have been relieved by it.

Let this exhortation be regarded, not only by those that abound in wealth, but by all others: for he who, acting on strict principles of integrity and piety, is faithful in the smallest trust, is, and would in fact appear to be faithful also in one of much greater importance if it were committed to him; and he who is unjust in the least, matter, is, if he can attempt it with views of impunity, unjust also in much.

If therefore it appears that you have not been faithful in the management of the unrighteous or deceitful mammon, as I before called those precarious treasures, who will intrust you with the true riches? And I repeat it again, if you have not been faithful in what was really another's, and only was committed to your care and management for a little while; who do you think will give you [that which shall be] your own by an unalienable right and eternal possession? You cannot sure expect so high a reward without a behaviour correspondent to it.

But, as I formerly have said, I tell you now again, No domestic whatever can serve two different masters; for he assuredly will either hate and despise the one, and love the other; or at least he will adhere to the commands of the one, and neglect those of the other: so, in like manner, you cannot faithfully serve God, and yet at the same time be the servant of mammon, having your hearts engrossed by worldly interests and pursuits. (Compare Mat. vi. 24. Vol. I. p. 227.)

And the Pharisees also, who were extremely covetous, stood by and heard all these things; and they contemptuously derided him as a poor visionary,

That when you fail, and die out of this world.] It is with apparent propriety that our Lord suggests the thoughts of death as an antidote against covetousness. Strange it is that so many on the very borders of the grave should be so wretchedly enslaved to that unreasonable passion!

If you have not been faithful in what was another's, &c.] This is well expressed, though not exactly rendered, in the version of 1727. If you have embezzled what another gave you in trust, how can he give you an estate in perpetuity? It probably alludes to a custom of rewarding faithful stewards, by giving them some part of the estate they have managed.

They derided him.] The words might more exactly be rendered, they sneered, visionary, who did not understand human life, or only appeared to despise the world, because (as they supposed) it was out of his reach.

And he said to them, Ye Pharisees are they that justify yourselves before men, and find out a great many plausible excuses for possessing and pursuing the world as you do; but God knows your hearts, and knows that it is not by love to him, but to yourselves, that you are animated, even in the most specious and pompous of your actions; for that which is highly esteemed among men is, in many instances, an abomination before God, who observes the vile purposes from which it often proceeds, and cannot be imposed upon by any glittering misrepresentation or disguise.

16 (Compare 1 Sam. xvi. 7.) But a dispensation is now opening upon the world which will put you to deserved shame; for the law and the prophets [were] the only Divine revelation among you until John the Baptist appeared; but from that time the kingdom of God is publicly and plainly preached, and everyone forces his way into it; for considerable numbers, notwithstanding all your sophistry, stand well disposed to receive it, and are willing to secure its blessings at any rate. (Compare Mat. xi. 12, 13. Vol. I. 17 p. 396.) Yet I would not be understood as if I intended by what I say to put any slight on former revelations; for I rather establish and vindicate them, and again declare it to you as a most solemn truth, That it is much easier for heaven and earth to pass away, and the whole system of created nature to be destroyed, than for one tittle of the law of God to fail, or the least precept of it to be set aside as faulty. (See Mat. 18 v. 18. Vol. I. p. 205.) And, far from doing any thing to lessen or abate the force of it, I rather assert it in its utmost extent and spirituality; insomuch that you know I have before declared, notwithstanding all your boasted, but dangerous, traditions, that whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, unless it be on account of a breach of the most fundamental article of the

There was a gravity and dignity in our Lord's discourse which, insolent as they were, would not permit them to laugh out; but by some scornful air they hinted to each other their mutual contempt: and they have, no doubt, seriously answered for it, as others of their temper and character will.

15 And he said unto them, Ye are they which justify yourselves before men; but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is highly esteemed among men, is abomination in the sight of God.

16 The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it.

17 And it is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail.

18 Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another committeth adultery: and whosoever marrieth the marriage-covenant, commits adultery; and whosoever marries her that is put away from her former husband for any less important cause, commits adultery with her, as the first contract still continues in force by which she is the wife of another. (Compare Mat. v. 32. Vol. I. p. 212.)

IMPROVEMENT.

May the wisdom of the children of this world in their comparatively trifling concerns excite a holy emulation in the children of light! Is it not much better worth our while to employ all the attention of our thoughts in observing opportunities for the good of our souls, and to exert all the force of our resolutions in improving them, than to labour merely for the meat which perishes, for that deceitful mammon, that treacherous friend, which will at best only amuse us for a few years, and will for ever forsake us in our greatest extremity.

Let us take occasion, from this parable, to think how soon we must part with all our present possessions; how soon we must give an account of our respective stewardships as those who must be no longer stewards. Let us therefore manage them in such a manner as may most effectually promote the great purposes of our everlasting happiness. To this end, let us remember how absolutely necessary it is that we abound in works of charity and benevolence, and that we endeavour to abstract our hearts from an over-eager attachment to these lying vanities; for surely the trifles of earth are no better. Let us not imagine that our particular address can find out the secret of serving God and mammon, since Christ represents it as an impossibility and contradiction.

May we be found faithful in what God has committed to us, whether it be little or much; and govern ourselves, not by the maxims of this vain world, but by those of the gospel! And if the same temper that led the covetous Pharisees to deride our Lord, engage the children of this world to pour contempt upon us as visionaries and enthusiasts, we have much greater reason to be grieved for them than for ourselves. Their censures can be matter of but little account to us, when we consider that the things which are highly esteemed by men are often an abomination in the sight of God. His law is sacred, and the constitutions of his kingdom are unalterable: may the temper of our minds be so altered and disposed as may suit it! For another day, and another world, will shew that real Christianity is the only wisdom; and that all the refinements of human policy without it are but specious madness and laborious ruin!
SECT. CXXV.

Our Lord to enforce the preceding admonition, delivers the parable of the rich glutton and Lazarus. Luke XVI. 19, to the end.

dat his hearers might be more effectually dissuaded from addicting themselves to worldly pursuits and carnal pleasures, Jesus added another parable, which might have been sufficient to convince the covetous Pharisees of their madness in deriding what he had before said. And he addressed himself to them in words to this effect: There was a certain rich man who lived in the greatest elegance and pomp; for he wore robes of purple, and vests of fine linen, and daily feasted in a very splendid and luxurious manner. And there was in the same place a certain poor man named Lazarus, a person indeed of eminent piety, but in the utmost indigence and distress; who being unable to labour, or so much as to walk, was laid down, at his gate, to beg the rich man's charity; and all his body being full of sores and ulcers, he was a most miserable spectacle: And, being almost famished with hunger, he earnestly desired to be fed, if it were but with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table; yea, he was in so exposed and abandoned a condition, that the very dogs came and licked his sores, which lay uncovered in the open air.

* A certain poor man named Lazarus.] An exceeding proper name; which seems (as Lud. Cappellus observes) to be derived from Λαζάρως, to suffer, and signifies a helpless person; an etymology on all accounts much more natural than that so generally followed, which derives it from Ἐλείζωρ, God is my helper.—Some have imagined, from the name Lazarus, and the particular detail of circumstances, that this was an history, rather than a parable; but this must be a groundless supposition, as it is plain the incidents are parabolical. But this criticism of Lomeirius, who explains it as a mystical representation of the Jewish and Gentile church, is far more extravagant.—Dr. Lightfoot, and others, have shewn, that the Jews in their Gemara have a parable much to the same purpose.

b Yea, the dogs came and licked his sores.] Had the connection in the original been attended to, I think there could have been no debate among commentators, whether this were mentioned as an alleviation, or an addition to his calamity. For however lenient and healing the tongue of a dog may be in such cases, the words άληθώς should be rendered, yea; as Erasmus, Beza, Schmidius, and Calvin contend, and, above all, Raphelius abundantly proves. (Annot. ex Xen. p. 106, 107.) The circumstance is surely recorded, to shew that his ulcers lay bare, and were not (as Isaiah in another case expresses it, chap. i. 6.) either closed, or bound up, or mollified with ointment.—Some versions add, that no man gave unto him; which Grotius thinks is intimatet in his wishing to be fed with the crumbs which the dogs used to gather; (Mat. xv. 27.) If so, it was with singular propriety that he who denied a crumb is represented as unable to obtain a drop; but as it is not expressed in the Greek, either here, or in Abraham's reply, I did not chuse to insert it. Giving alms will be no security to those that live a sensual life.
But so it was, that in a little time the poor beggar, worn out with the load of so great a calamity, died; and, being a favourite of heaven, notwithstanding all his distresses on earth, he was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom, the abode of happy spirits in a separate state: the rich man also died quickly after him; for all his riches were not sufficient to procure the least continuance of his life; and he was buried with great funeral solemnity and pomp. But observe the difference of their circumstances beyond the grave. This poor sensual creature was by God's righteous vengeance condemned to everlasting misery; and in the unseen world, being in the midst of torments, aggravated by all the indulgence and delicacy of his former life, he lifted up his weeping and desiring eyes, and saw Abraham from afar, and the poor despised Lazarus lying in his bosom, as a newly received guest at the heavenly banquet, placed next the father of the faithful himself.

And calling out with the greatest earnestness and importunity, he said, O father Abraham, have compassion upon me, a poor unhappy descendant of thine, and send Lazarus, not to reach out to me any of the dainties of heaven, for I presume not to ask so great a favour, but only to bring me a little water; and if I may not have a draught of it, I should be thankful if he might be permitted to dip the tip of his finger in water to refresh my tongue, though it were but for a carried by angels into Abraham's bosom.] The Jews assign this office to angels (see Drusius in loc.) and, no doubt, with the utmost propriety, considering how suitable it is to their benevolent nature, and to the circumstances of a departed spirit. The Greeks (as Elster, Obscr. Vol. I. p. 255. and many others have observed) assign guides to the souls of the dead, to conduct them to their respective seats. It is strange any should render τοις κλαπαοι τω Αβαραμ, Abraham's bower, or (with Jac. Cappellus) Abraham's haven. Our translation is in all respects much more just. It alludes to the way of representing the entertainments of heaven, by sharing a magnificent banquet with Abraham, and the other patriarchs, (compare Mat. viii. 11. and Luke xxii. 30.) And nothing can better describe the honour and happiness of Lazarus, who had lain in so wretched a condition before the glutton's gate, than telling us that he was placed next to Abraham, and so lay in his bosom. (Compare John xiii. 23. sect. clxx.) Thus Cassabon and Grotius well explain it. As for the rich man's seeing him there, Mr. L'Enfant thinks the Jews borrowed this manner of speaking from the Greeks, who described the seats of the blessed as separated from those of the damned by a great impassable river, from the opposite banks of which they might converse. Many of them also expressly speak of a great charm intersected. See Elster, Obscr. Vol. I. p. 256, 257, and Grotius in loc.

in the unseen world.] This seems generally the sense of the Greek world, as was observed before, in note 1, on Mat. xvi. 18. Vol. VI. 469. Both the rich man and Lazarus were in Hades, though in different regions of it. See Grotius's learned and judicious note here.

dip the tip of his finger in water, &c.] The
The rich man begs for a drop of water to cool his tongue.

25 But Abraham said, with awful and inflexible severity, Son, remember the former days when thou and Lazarus were upon earth, that thou didst then in thy life-time receive thy good things which thou wast so foolish as to choose for thy portion, in the neglect of God and of thy soul; and likewise Lazarus then received [his] evil things, of which thou wast witness: but now the scene is changed, so that he in his turn is comforted and thou art justly tormented; and neither his joy, nor thine anguish, can admit of any end or interruption. And besides all this, as to the favour thou desirest from the hand of Lazarus, it is a thing impossible to be granted; for between us and you there is a great chasm fixed; a vast unmeasurable void is interposed; so that, they who would go from hence to you, if any should be so compassionate as to desire to help you, cannot; neither can they who are there come unto us; but we are still to continue at an unapproachable distance from each other.

26 Then the rich man, as he perceived that his own case was irretrievable, said unto Abraham, There may however be a passage from you to the other world, as it is plain there is from thence to you; I beseech thee therefore, O Father, that thou wouldst please to send him to my father's house, on an errand of the utmost importance; For I have there five brethren, thoughtless young creatures like myself, who are now revelling on those possessions which were once mine, and are likely ere long to fall into the same misery with me: I earnestly entreat thee therefore that he may be sent to testify to them the reality and importance of

The Hebrews drank their wine mingled with water; and large quantities of water, on one occasion or other, were used at their feasts: (see John ii. 6.) There seems therefore in this petition a proper allusion to that.—Archbishop Tillotson observes, with his usual vivacity, that this is the only instance we meet with in scripture of any thing that looks like a prayer put up to a glorified saint, (Tillotson's Works, Vol. ii. p. 142.) and even here the application was in vain, and no relief was the saint capable of giving. —It is observable, the rich man speaks as knowing Lazarus, and as supposing (ver. 23.) that his brethren also might know him on his appearing to them.

25 But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented.

26 And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulph fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you, cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence.

27 Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldst send him to my father's house;

28 For I have five brethren, thoughtless young creatures like myself, who are now revelling on those possessions which were once mine, and are likely ere long to fall into the same misery with me: I earnestly entreat thee therefore that he may be sent to testify to them the reality and importance of portance of this invisible world, that they may be awakened to avoid those evil courses that have been my ruin, and may not also come into this place of torment.

But Abraham said in reply to him, Thou knowest they have an excellent Divine revelation in the writings of Moses and the prophets; let them but hearken to the warnings and instructions that are given by them, and they have means sufficient to secure them from that danger.

And when the poor tormented creature found this also was objected to, he pleaded still in their behalf, and said, Nay, father Abraham, they will slight these as I foolishly did; but surely if one go to them from the dead, they cannot withstand so awful a messenger, but will undoubtedly repent, and reform their lives.

But Abraham put an end to the discourse, with an assurance of the fruitlessness of any such extraordinary means for their conviction; and he said to him, The evidences of the Divine revelation are such, that if they hearken not to Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded to a thorough repentance and reformation though one should arise from the dead to visit them. For though it might indeed alarm them for a time, the same, prejudices and lusts which led them to despise those methods of instruction that God has given them, would also lead them ere long to slight and forget such an awful apparition as you desire they might see.

IMPROVEMENT.

Most evidently may we learn from this parable, that it is im-possible to know either love or hatred by any thing that is before us under the sun; (Eccles. ix. 1.) Who that had seen the pomp and plenty of this rich sinner, and compared it with the indi

If they hearken not to Moses, &c.] It is true, Moses no where expressly asserts a future state of rewards and punishments; yet the facts recorded by him strongly enforce the natural arguments in proof of it; and the prophets speak plainly of it in many places. See Psal. xvi. 9, 10, 11. xvii. 15. xxiii. 6. xlv. 14. 15. lxvii. 17. & seq. Prov. xiv. 22, Eccles. iii. 17, 21. xi. 9. xii. 7, 13, 14. and Ezek. xviii. 19, 20, 21.—Bishop Atterbury has excellently shewn the justice of Abraham's assertion here, in his incomparable discourse on this text. (See his Sermons, Vol. II. serm. 2.) The impenitence of many who saw another Lazarus, raised from the dead, (John xi. 46.) and the wickedness of the soldiers who were eye-witnesses to the resurrection of Christ, and yet that very day suffered themselves to be hired to bear a false testimony against it. Mat. xxviii. 4, 13.) are most affecting and astonishing illustrations of this truth: for each of those miracles was far more convincing than such an apparition as is here referred to would have been.
gance and misery of Lazarus, would have imagined that the latter had been the child, and the former the enemy of God? But let us judge nothing before the time; (1 Cor. iv. 5.) Our Lord Jesus Christ shews us the period of all the prosperity of the wicked, and of all the calamities with which good men may be exercised. And what availed the luxuries of life, or the magnificence of burial, to a wretch tormented in flames? Surely the fierceness of those flames would be proportionable to the luxury in which he had formerly lived, and the sense of the torment be heightened by the delicacy he had once indulged. May God awaken those unhappy persons, whatever their rank in the present life may be, who place their happiness and glory in being clothed in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day! May they lift up their enchanted deluded eyes, and see that pointed sword of the Divine vengeance which is suspended over them by so weak a thread; and may they take this warning from one greater than Moses and the prophets, from one that came from the dead to enforce it, that they pass not into that place of torment.

22 Let poor afflicted saints take comfort in what has now been read, though they may be despised and slighted by men. The time will shortly come, when those angels who now descend in an invisible form to minister to them, will appear as their guard to convey them to the regions of glory. Abraham's bosom, will be opened to them, and the dainties of heaven be set before multitudes, who, perhaps, while on this side of the grave, hardly knew how to procure even the necessaries of life.

May we never view those seats of glory, as this wretched sensualist did, at an unapproachable distance! Let us think seriously of his deplorable circumstances, when he asked a drop of water from the tip of Lazarus's finger, and yet was denied. Dreadful representation! yet made by Christ himself, who surely knew how to describe the case with the utmost propriety. Behold, O our souls, this son of Abraham, in the flaming prison, in all the restless agonies of torment and despair: and we may judge what dependance to place on a descent from pious ancestors, or a participation of external privileges.

27, 28 We enquire not curiously into the motives which engaged him to request that so extraordinary a warning might be sent to his brethren; whether it might proceed from a remainder of natural affection, from a fear of meeting them in the same misery, or from a mixture of both. It is enough to observe how and upon what principles it was denied, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead. Let none vainly excuse themselves from believing the evidence of the revelation God has given, on a pretence that if they saw saw signs and wonders they would believe. The heart of man may be hardened against the most sensible and immediate miracle; but if that evidence were irresistable, it would ill become us to dictate to God when and to whom it should be given. Let us 29 examine and acquiesce in such as he has seen fit to afford; and pass through our various scenes of life as those that have eternity in view, and are persuaded we must each of us, in a few years at farthest, be with Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, or with the rich man in that tormenting flame.

SECT CXXVI.

Christ repeats his exhortations to an inoffensive conduct and a forgiving temper; and warns his disciples not to arrogate any merit to themselves. Luke XVII. 1—11.

Then said he unto the disciples, It is impossible but that offences will come; but woe unto him through whom they come,

2 It were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones.

3 Take heed to yourselves:

a Take heed to yourselves.] This contains a strong and important intimation, how much sin, and scandal is occasioned, by a severe quarrelsome temper in the disciples of Christ; as it not only stirs up the corruptions of those with whom they contend, but leads others to think meanly of a profession, which has so little efficacy, to soften, and sweeten the tempers, of those who maintain it.

may govern all your passions aright, and particularly your resentments by which otherwise much sin may be occasioned, both to yourselves and others. And if thy brother trespass against thee, do not lay up a secret grudge against him for it, but plainly and faithfully rebuke him, endeavouring to convince him of the evil he has committed; and if he appear to repent of his fault, forgive him immediately, without insisting on any rigorous satisfaction. And if he trespass against thee again and again, even though he should repeat his fault, seven times in a day, (compare Psal. cxix. 164.) and seven times in a day return to thee, seriously, saying, I repent of my folly, and am heartily sorry for the injury I have done thee; thou shalt forgive him even these repeated offences. (Compare Mat. xviii. 21, 22. Vol. I. p. 498.)

Then the apostles said unto the Lord, Lord, we are sensible, that in this instance, as well as in several others, we have need to pray; thou wouldst increase our faith: Oh quicken our apprehension of the reality and importance of the motives by which all thy commands are enforced, and of the authority by which they are dictated; that we may not scruple to submit even to such precepts as these, how hard soever they may bear upon flesh and blood.

And the Lord said, If you had ever so little faith, though it were but as a grain of mustard-seed, yet (as I formerly told you,) it would conquer the greatest difficulties: so that you might as it were, be able to say to this sycamore tree, Be thou rooted up, and planted in the sea, and it should presently obey you.

Endeavour therefore to live in the exercise of this noble grace, and in a series of such services as are the proper fruits of it: But in the midst of all, be careful to maintain the deepest humility, as in the presence of God your heavenly Master, on whom, as you are his servants, you can have no claim of merit: For who is there of you, that if he has a servant ploughing his ground, ground, or feeding his flock, will say unto him, as soon as he comes in from the field, Come in, and sit down at the table with me? Or will he not rather say to him, if it was a part of that servant’s business to do it, Make ready somewhat for my supper, and when it is prepared gird up thy garments close about thee, and wait upon me, while I am eating and drinking; and afterwards thou shalt sit down to eat and drink thyself? And suppose he should observe his orders with the greatest diligence, does he think himself obliged to thank that servant, because he hath done what was commanded him? I apprehend he does not, because he has an authority over the servant, and may justly claim his obedience as matter of debt. Now to apply this to your own services; so likewise ye, when you have faithfully done all that was commanded you in the exactest manner, yet should still say, Surely we are worthless and unprofitable servants, who cannot pretend to have merited any thing from the hand of our Master; for we have done no more than what we were by virtue of our relation to God, and dependance upon him, indispensably obliged to do, as much as any purchased slave is obliged to serve his master. And assure yourselves, that no services will be so pleasing to God, as those performed with such an humble spirit.

These discourses, and those above mentioned happened in our Lord’s journey to the feast of the dedication; and as he went to Jerusalem to attend it, he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee, taking those parts of Samaria in his way, which lay next to Galilee.

IMPROVE

Unprofitable servants. The word καρποφόροι sometimes signifies wicked; (Rom. iii. 12, Matt. xxv. 30.) but in this connection it cannot have that sense. I entirely agree with Heinsius, that here, and 2 Sam. vi. 22, Septuag. it signifies mean, or inconsiderable, as the best of men certainly are.

As he went to Jerusalem. As Luke has related the two little histories contained in the next section at some distance from each other, it is very difficult (as the attentive reader will observe) to place them together without some tautology. I have therefore inserted the introduction to one of them at the end of this section; leaving out the word cypher, it came to pass, which is a mere expletive; or at most does only imply that what is mentioned in the context happened in this journey, or may refer to the discourses Christ had before delivered, as we have observed in the paraphrase.

a Note
IMPROVEMENT.

Let us renew our guard against every thing in our conduct, which might give offence to the meanest and weakest; and against every thing, which might by a bad example mislead others, or further the enemies of religion with matter of reproach and accusation against it. Let us imibe the forgiving Spirit of the gospel, and bearing in mind the numberless instances in which God has forgiven us, though we have sinned against him not only seven times, but seventy times seven; let us arm ourselves in some degree with the same mind, and endeavour to forbear, and forgive one another, even as God for Christ's sake has freely forgiven us. (Eph. iv. 32. and Col. iii. 13.)

5 In a sense of the weakness of our faith, let us pray to Christ to increase it; and then those duties will be discharged with ease and delight, which appeared most difficult in a distant prospect. Yet when faith and patience have had their most perfect work, when our Master's will has been borne with the most entire submission, and done with the most zealous dispatch, let us not pretend to place any merit in our own actions or sufferings; but let us think of ourselves as the servants of God, yea, as unprofitable servants, whose goodness extendeth not to our Great Master: And to the riches of his grace let us ascribe it, that our feeble powers are strengthened to the performance of our duty; and that our worthless services are accepted, and the numberless deficiencies of them mercifully excused.

SECT. CXXVII.

Christ travelling through Samaria rebukes the intemperate zeal of James and John, against those who refused to grant him entertainment; and heals ten lepers. Luke IX. 51—56. XVII, 12—19.

It was observed in the close of the former section, that our Lord was now on his journey from Galilee, near the feast of the dedication: and it came to pass, that as the days were now near the feast of the dedication.]

Taking it for granted that the following word, after the, refers to Christ's ascension (the reasons for which I shall give below), I think this the only place where this little story can properly come in. Most harmonizers place it just before the feast of tabernacles (of which we had an account in the seventh and eighth chapters of John, from sect. CXXVIII. to CXXV); and chiefly on their authority, without a critical examination, I had mentioned it in that connection.

AND it came to pass, when the time was come... now almost fulfilled in which he knew he should be received up to heaven again, having dispatched the ministry which he was to discharge on earth; notwithstanding all the painful scenes through which he was yet to pass, his heart was so animated with a regard to his Father's honour and the salvation of men, and so cheered with the views of his own approaching exaltation and glory, that, in defiance of all his most inveterate enemies, enemies, he resolutely set his face to go up to Jerusalem, though he knew it was the last journey he should take from Galilee thither, and that tortures and death awaited him there. And as his way lay through Samaria, being a stranger there, he sent messengers before his face, who in their progress entered into a village of the Samaritans to prepare entertainment for him; only desiring to take a lodging there, and to pay for their accommodation. But the Samaritans had such a national grudge against the Jews, that they would not receive him, nor grant him the common rites of hospitality due to any stranger because his face was directed towards Jerusalem; and they concluded, from the season of the year, that this visit was intended as a peculiar honour to the temple there.

And when his disciples, James and John, who attended him, saw it, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we speak for fire to come down from heaven to destroy them, as Elijah did with regard to his enemies (2 Kings i. 10, 12); for surely one word in such a case will do it, and the artillery of heaven will be much more ready to avenge such an affront offered to thee, who art so much superior to any of the prophets?

But [Jesus] turning short upon them, rebuked them with a becoming severity, and said, Ye know not what kind of spirit ye are of; you neither consider the genius of the gospel, so much more gentle than that of the law, nor do you sufficiently know your own hearts; and if you were more diligently to examine them, you would soon find that there is a great deal of personal resentment and ostentation mingled with all that zeal for me which you so warmly express on this occasion. But I reject your motion of an affront, considering the antipathy of the two nations.

And sent messengers before his face: and they went, and entered into a village of the Samaritans to make ready for him.

And they did not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem.

And when his disciples, James and John, saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?

But he turned, and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of.

For the Son of man as a peculiar honour to the temple there.) None of the feasts observed at Jerusalem could be more remarkable in this view, as this was kept in commemoration of the temple's being purified, after it had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes, to whose idolatrous impositions the Samaritans had willingly offered to submit; as was observed before in note b on John iv. 9. Vol. 1. p. 162. Josephus observes (Antig. lib. xx. cap. 6. (al. 5), § 1, & Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 12. (al. 11), § 5), that the Jews going from Galilee to Jerusalem at their public feast, took Samaria in their way; and it might be resented as something man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. And they went to another village.

Luke XVII. 12.—And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men who were lepers, which stood afar off.

13 And they lifted up their voices and said, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us.

14 And when he saw them, he said unto them, Go shew yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that as they went they were cleansed.

15 And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God;

16 And fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks: and he was a Samaritan.

17 And Jesus answering said, Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine?

18 There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger.

19 And he said unto...
Reflections on the evil of a persecuting spirit.

Arise, go thy way; this thy faith in my power has saved thee, and been happily made the means of thy cure; and from these grateful sentiments, with which thy heart is filled, thou mayest conclude the cure thou hast received is given thee in mercy.

IMPROVEMENT.

Who would not have imagined that the blessed Jesus should have been most cordially welcome wherever he came, when there was grace in all his words, and benevolence in all his actions? Yet these Samaritans would not receive him because he was a Jew. And thus do unhappy prejudices, taken up on imaginary grounds, against men, and things in the general, sometimes injure the best of men, and prove much more hurtful to the persons themselves by whom they are entertained.

The rash disciples would have called for fire from heaven; and let us observe how Christ treated the proposal. He treated it like himself; like the kind compassionate Friend of human nature; and also like one who well knew what was in man, (John ii. 25), and how little human terrors and severities can do towards producing a real conversion. Yet fire from heaven might have carried along with it some rational ground of conviction, which penal laws and sanguinary executions can never produce.

What then would Christ have said to these disciples if they had themselves proposed to smite with the sword, or to cast fire-brands into the house of these inhospitable men? Little do they know their own spirit; little do they understand either the true genius or the true interest of the gospel, who have recourse to such violent methods as these to extirpate heresy, and to propogate truth. Let us bless God that neither the guilt nor misery of such a conduct is ours.

Let us learn to search our own hearts, that we may form a thorough acquaintance with ourselves; which will greatly promote both the comfort and usefulness of life. Especially let us attend to our aims and intentions, and be greatly jealous over our own hearts, lest we indulge our irregular passions under religious pretences, and set up the standards of malice and pride in the name of the Lord.

From the story of the ten lepers let us learn importantly to seek the influences of Christ, to purge us from that far more odious and fatal disease which sin has spread over our whole nature; and, after the example of the Samaritan, let us own the mercy we have received. Have we not reason to fear that, of the multitudes...
tudes who are indebted to the Divine goodness, there is not one in ten who has a becoming sense of it? Let us labour to impress our hearts deeply with such a sense. Let us remember what it is that God expects of us; and let us farther consider that, as the exercise of gratitude towards such a Benefactor is most reasonable, so also in proportion it is most delightful to the soul; it is indeed (as one well expresses it) like the incense of the Jewish priest, which, while it did an honour to God, did likewise regale with its own fragrancy the person by whom it was offered.

SECT. CXXVIII.

Our Lord cautions the Jews against expecting a pompous kingdom of the Messiah, and warns them of the approaching national destruction which would be the consequence of rejecting him. Luke XVII. 20, to the end.

LUKE XVII. 20.

AND when he was demanded of the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God should come; he answered them, and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation.

21 Neither shall they say, Lo here, or lo there: for behold, the kingdom of God is within you.

22 And he said unto the disciples, The days will come when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it.

* Being asked by some of the Pharisees.]

I pretend not to say whether this was at Jerusalem or some neighbouring place; nor is it any way material to determine it.

b The kingdom of God is among you. So I render the words τοις ἑαυτοῖς, referring the reader to those exact critics in the Greek language, Beza and Raphelius (Ann. ev. Xen. p. 109, 110), for a more particular vindication of it. It is certain our Lord could not properly say the kingdom of God was in the Pharisees to whom he spoke, whose temper was entirely alienated from the nature and design of it.
Christ represents the manner of his coming.

23 And they shall say to you, Behold, [he is] here, or behold [he is] there; [but] do not you go out on hearing such reports to seek him, nor join to follow [them] in any of their vain delusive schemes. For he will indeed come, but in a very different manner from what they expect; even to execute upon them a sudden and unavoidable destruction: for as the lightning which lightens from one [part] under heaven, shines in a moment with the greatest swiftness to the other [part] under heaven; so also in as swift and terrible a manner shall the coming of the Son of man be in his day, when he appears to plead the cause of that gospel which has been so generally despised. (Compare Mat. xxiv. 23, 27. sect. clxi.) Nevertheless, he must first suffer many things, and be yet more opprobriously and solemnly rejected by this generation of men, who shall by this public and national act of impiety and rebellion fill up the measure of their iniquities. (Compare Luke xxi. 18—21. John xix. 15. Acts iii. 13—15.)

26 Then shall impending vengeance fall upon them at once: and as it was in the days of Noah which preceded the flood, so shall it be in the days of the Son of man, or in those days when he shall come in the manner I have now described for the destruction of his enemies. For, notwithstanding the express predictions of Divine judgments approaching, they went on with their usual course as if there were no danger; they did eat, they drank, they married wives, [and] their daughters were given in marriage; and with a confident security they persisted in the business, entertainments and luxuries of life, till the very day in which Noah entered into the ark; and then the deluge came with irresistible fury, so that it overthrew and destroyed them all at once; (Gen. vi. 13. vii. 21.) Likewise also as it was at Sodom in the days of Lot, they did eat and drink, they bought and sold, they planted vineyards, and built magnificent houses, and never thought themselves more secure, or their pleasant country more like to flourish; Thus did they carelessly go on, despising every admonition of their guilt and danger: but on the very day when Lot went out of Sodom, an horrible tempest of fire and brimstone was rained down by the Lord from heaven, and

27 They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark: and the flood came and destroyed them all.

28 Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot, they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded:

29 But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all.
And foretells the destruction of the unbelieving Jews.

30 Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed. (Gen. xix. 14, 24.) Even so shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed, when he will sensibly display his power in the destruction of this sinful people: the Jewish nation shall be as careless and confident as if there was not the least danger, indulging themselves in all kinds of luxury and extravagance, till they shall see ruin surrounding them on every side, from which it will be as impossible for them to escape as it was for the sinners of the old world, or the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. (Compare Mat. xxiv. 37—39. sect. clxx.)

In that day, if any one shall be taking the air on the house-top, or be retired thither for any other purpose, and his best dress and furniture be in the house, let him not come down into the house to take it away; but let him flee the readiest way by those steps which go down on the outside of the building: and he that is at work in the field, stripped of his upper garment let him likewise not return back, though it be but a few steps to take it. (Compare Mat. xxiv. 17, 18. sect. clxii.) But remember the awful example of Lot's wife, with the dreadful issue of her delay and looking back, (Gen. xix. 26.) and take heed lest, like her, you perish in that sudden vengeance, which shall overtake your former abode, if you allow yourselves to linger in it, or turn back for the sake of any thing you have left there. For in that day, he that shall seek to preserve his life by retiring into some fortified city, and especially into that where it might seem he should be safest, shall lose it; but he that shall be thought to take the ready way to lose his life, shall preserve it; for they who regard my admonitions, and retire, however their conduct may be censured as imprudent, shall survive the general ruin.

31 In that day, he which shall be upon the house-top, and his stuff in the house, let him not come down to take it away: and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back.

33 Whosoever shall seek to save his life, shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life, shall preserve it.

[Engaging in all kinds of luxury and extravagance.] It is not unseasonable for Great Britain to recollect, that when a pompous and luxurious way of living has come to its height in many of the most considerable ancient and modern nations, there has been a very sudden transition to the lowest state of servitude and ruin. All histories abound with instances of this kind; and God grant that our own age may not add one to the number!

[Let him not come down into the house to take it away.] This shows, beyond all controversy, that this discourse refers not to the final judgment, from which there can be no escape; but to the destruction of Jerusalem, from which it is well known that many Christians were preserved by this caution. See Grotius in loc.—The Jewish houses were built with a flat roof, and had stairs on the outside to go down from the top. Compare note e on Luke v. 19, Vol. I. p. 247.

I tell you, in that night, that gloomy calamitous time, the Providence of God shall be strangely seen, in delivering some of my disciples, when others in the very same place and circumstances shall perish in the common calamity: there shall, for instance, be two persons lying in the same bed; and the one shall be taken by the enemy; and the other dismissed. Two women shall be grinding together at the same mill: the one shall be taken, and the other dismissed. And two men shall be working or walking together in the field: the one shall be taken, and the other dismissed. (Compare Mat. xxiv. 40, 41. sect. clxiii.)

And they answered and said to him, Where Lord, and to whom shall this destruction happen? And he said to them, That common proverb is applicable to the present occasion, Where soever the carcase [is,] there will the eagles be gathered together, wherever the impenitent and unbelieving Jews are, the vengeance of God will pursue them, and the Roman eagles shall (as it were) fly upon them as a helpless prey; and so, where their numbers are the largest, there the destruction will be greatest and most terrible. (Compare Mat. xxiv. 28. sect. clxi.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. May our minds be formed to a true taste and relish for the kingdom of God! and may we learn wherein it consists; not, like the kingdoms of this world, in external pomp and splendor, but in righteousness, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost, and that inward subjection of soul to the Divine government which is the essence of religion, and the grand security and felicity of our natures! Many are, like the Pharisees, talking of it, and expecting it, while it is among them, and they know it not; and, perhaps, despise the humble Christians in whom it resides, and most eminently

6 The one shall be taken by the enemy.] That this is the sense of the word ἅπαξλειτούμενος, and that ἅπαξλειτούμενος in the latter clause should be rendered dismissed, or let go, I think Elmer has abundantly proved; Olives. Vol. I. p. 262. 263. He has likewise shown there, how customary it was for women to grind at the mill. See also Bov. Exerc. p. 30.

7 Where Lord, &c.] I have seen few paraphrases which do not supercede this question; I have forbore mentioning Jerusalem above, that I might leave room for it.

2 Where soever the carcase is, &c.] Dr. Clarke has explained the general sense of this proverb with great judgment. (See his Seventeen Sermons, p. 381. & seq.) It is, as if it had been said, The like causes will produce the like effects. But it seems to suggest so proper an allusion to the Roman standards, and to the carnage they made of the Jews, that I could not forbear introducing the mention of it.
nently triumphs. May they who think most lightly of it, never have cause to wish at last for the return of those days of the Son of man, which are now their burden, rather than their pleasure, while they hear vital and inward religion in vain recommended and enforced!

What our Lord says of his coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, may be applied, as it is elsewhere, to his appearance at the final judgment, of which the former was a figure. Thus shall the men of that generation be immersed in business and pleasure; and that tremendous day shall come upon them; even as a thief in the night; so that they shall find themselves overwhelmed with irrecoverable ruin, while they cry, Peace and safety; (1 Thes. v. 2, 3.) And thus doth the awful hour of death, which consigns men over to judgment, surprise the generality of mankind, while they are thoughtless of it and unprepared for its approach, amidst all the solemn warnings of it which they daily receive: May we be always in a prepared posture, and daily live as on the verge of eternity!

And if once we are engaged in a course of serious preparation, let us remember Lot's wife, and take heed that we turn not back again. We flee as for our lives; let us not look behind us. Whatever is to be left, whatever is to be lost, it is enough if our life be given us as for a prey.

If we have any just hope that it will be so given us, we have a great deal of reason to own and adore the riches of Divine grace to us, of that distinguishing grace which has taken us when others are left; some perhaps, employed in the same business, and dwelling in the same place; and, may not I add, some lying in the same bed too!

In a word, let all seriously bethink themselves, and flee from the wrath to come. God spared not Judea, that favourite country, when they rejected his gospel, and his Son: let us fear, lest he also spare not us; (Rom. xi. 20, 21.) In this respect also, whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together. The same causes will produce the same effects; and when we, in particular, of these happy, but sinful nations, consider our numerous and aggravated provocations, we shall see much greater reason to wonder that the judgments of God have been so long delayed, than that they should at last fall upon us with an insupportable weight.
SECT. CXXIX.

Christ presses his disciples to perseverance in prayer by the parable of the importunate widow; and recommends humility by that of the Pharisee and publican. Luke XVIII. 1—14.

LUKE XVIII. 1.

THUS our Lord discoursed with his disciples of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; and, for their encouragement under those hardships, which they might in the mean time expect, from their unbelieving countrymen, or others; he spake a parable to them; which was intended to inculcate upon them this great truth, that, how distressed soever their circumstances might be, they ought always to pray with faith and perseverance, and not to faint under their trials.

For this purpose he discoursed to them in the following manner, saying, There was a judge in a certain city, who neither feared God nor reverenced man; but was wicked enough to set light by all regards to both, and to make his own humour and secular interest the only rule of his actions. And there was a widow in that city who had sustained some injury from an enemy more powerful than herself; and, having no other way to obtain redress, she came to him, at a place and time when she could not be denied access, and said, I come to put myself under the protection of the law, and to demand thine assistance as a magistrate, to do me justice against mine adversary, that I may not sink under his oppressive attempts. This was her case and plea; yet as she brought no present in her hand, he would not, for a considerable time, take any notice of it: but, as she still persevered in her petition, he afterwards said within himself, Though indeed I neither fear God, nor reverence man, and therefore care not what becomes of this cause, or who has the right or the wrong of it: Yet because this importunate widow gives me trouble by her continued application, I will do her justice, lest, by her coming perpetually to me with 2 Saying, There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man.

3 And there was a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, Avenge me of mine adversary.

4 And he would not for a while; but afterward he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man;

5 Yet because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by

3 Do me justice against mine adversary. This is the undoubted import of the phrase ἐπιστάλεσέ μοι δικαίωμα; and care should have been taken in the version to express it so as not to suggest the idea of revenge.

b She

by her continual coming she weary me.

6 And the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith.

7 And shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them?

8 I tell you, that he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?

9 And he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves.

b She even stunned and weary me out.] The word άνακτάω is very emphatical, and signifies to stun or beat down by violent and repeated blows on the head. Compare 1 Cor. ix. 27.

c Though he may seem to bear long with them, &c.] The learned Elsner supposes μακρόθυμων, with a small alteration in the accent, to correspond to βοώσων, and would render it, Shall he not avenge his elect, who cry to him, and wait patiently for it, that is, for his appearance in their favour? Elsner Observ. Vol. I. p. 265, 266.)

But, as I cannot think the words will naturally bear such a construction, or that the authorities he produces are satisfactory, I choose to retain our version. Nor can I, on this interpretation, perceive any inconsistency between ver. 7 and 8, since it is plain God might wait long, and yet at length execute a speedy and sudden vengeance on the persecuting enemies of his people. Compare Psal. lxxiii. 19. Hab. ii. 3. and especially Ecclus. xxv. 18. to which words Grotius supposes there is an allusion here.

d Will he find faith in the land?] It is evident the word γνωρίσει often signifies, not the earth in general, but some particular land or country; as in Acts vii. 2, 4, 11, 32 and in numberless other places. And the context here limits it to the less extensive signification.—The believing Hebrews were evidently in great danger of being wearied out with their persecutions and distresses. (Compare Heb. iii. 12—14. x. 23—39. xii. 1—4. Jam. i. 1—4. ii. 6. v. 10. 1 Pet. ii. 20—25. iii. 14—17. iv. 1, 2, 12—19. v. 9, 10.)—Mr. Fleming argues from hence, that deism shall prevail very much toward the conclusion of the Millenium (Christology, Vol. II. p. 385.) but it is evident from the connection as stated above, that this cannot justly be inferred from this text; nor does the fact itself seem at all probable.
The parable of the proud pharisee and humble publican.

There were, said he, two men who went up to the temple to pray there, choosing to offer up their particular devotions at that sacred place; and the one of them was a pharisee, one of that sect so greatly honoured among you, and the other a publican, whom you are used to number with the most contemptible of mankind. And the pharisee standing by himself, at as great a distance as he could from the miserable sinner, who had entered the temple with him, as if he feared being polluted by touching him, or any other person less holy than himself; prayed in this manner, O God, I thank thee, that I am not as the generality of other men are; but have always had the grace to withstand those vile temptations, which conquer and enslave them; so that I am not like the rapacious, unjust, adulterous generation among whom I live, or even like this wretched publican, that stands there at a distance, who probably is all this, and more: Thou knowest, O Lord, that I am zealous in all the traditions of the elders; that in conformity to them I fast twice a week; and with the greatest strictness I pay tithes of all that I possess, not excepting even the very herbs of my garden. (Compare Mat. xxii. 23, and Luke xi. 42.) Thus the pharisee offered his devotions, standing as near as he could to the court of the priests: confident in his own distinguished sanctity, and desirous to be observed by others. But the poor humble publican standing afar off, in the court of the gentiles, as unworthy to be numbered among God's people, and much more unworthy to appear in the presence of so holy a Deity, would not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven, the habitation of the Divine holiness and glory, but smote on his breast, in token of the bitterest remorse and deepest humiliation, saying, O God, I treat thee, be merciful to me a miserable sinner, who had formerly reproved their ostentatious manner of doing it: Mat. vi. 16—18. See Drusius in loc.

As if he feared being polluted by touching him, &c.] This Camer well explains this clause. Compare Isa. lxv. 5. I fast twice a week.] It has been observed by most commentators, that the Jews especially the Pharisees, used generally to keep private fasts on Mondays and Wednesdays, as the primitive Christians did on Fridays; and our Lord and the publican standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner.

12 I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess.

13 And the publican standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner.
who acknowledge, that I have nothing to hope, but from the riches of thine unmerited and forfeited goodness.

Now, added our Lord, I say unto you, and I would have you diligently observe it, that this poor, humble, self-abasing man went down to his house justified rather than the other; and would have been far more acceptable in the sight of God, than the Pharisee, if he had indeed been that moral upright man he pretended: Even in that case his pride and confidence in his own righteousness would have blasted all; for every one that exalteth himself, shall be abased, but he that humbleth himself, shall be exalted; as nothing is more hateful to God than pride, and nothing more amiable than lowliness of mind.

IMPROVEMENT.

How hateful is the character of this unjust judge, who neither feared God, nor reverenced man, but centred all his regards in himself! How hateful, and how contemptible, in any circumstance of life; especially in a magistrate, the guardian of the public interest, in comparison of which he ought to forget his own! Yet even he was prevailed upon by importunity, and our Lord mentions it, to encourage the fervour of our addresses to the throne of grace. What then, is the blessed God, like this unjust Judge, to be wearied out with a peal of words, and thereby weakly induced, to do what would otherwise have been contrary to his designs? Far from us be so absurd, and so impious a thought! Our condescending Lord only intended to intimate, that if the repeated importunate cries of the afflicted may at length prevail, even on an inhuman heart, they will be much more regarded by a righteous and merciful God, who is always ready to bestow his favours, when he sees we are prepared to receive them.—We may be sure, that God will vindicate his elect: Let this encourage them, though the rod of the wicked may for a while rest on their back! and let it intimidate the proud oppressors of the earth, who in the midst of all their pomp and power, are so wretched, as to have the prayers of God's people against them.

h Every one that exalteth himself, shall be abased, &c.] This appears to have been a favourite maxim with our Lord, since we find it repeated almost in these very words, no less than three different times, not to mention a multitude of expressions; in sense nearly equivalent. See Mat. xxiii. 12. and Luke xiv. 11. Compare note k, sect. civii.
Christ meets with one that was born blind.

Sect. Cxix. How instructive is this parable of the publican and pharisee? and how well connected with the former, to teach us that humility, without which repeated prayers will be repeated insults, and affronts to heaven? Let us not trust in ourselves, that we are righteous, and despise others; but rather be severe to our own faults, and candid to theirs.

11 Behold this arrogant pharisee, standing apart from the publican, but as near as he could to the seat of the Divine Majesty! And hear him boldly celebrating his own praises, rather than those of his Maker? God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men. We see a man may acknowledge, it is the grace of God, which makes the difference between him and others; and yet while he professes that humbling doctrine of the gospel, may be blown up with pride:

12 Yea, he may nourish, and express that pride, by the words in which he declares his faith. Mistaken creature! that imagined this encomium on himself was a prayer, and trusted in this defective morality, and these ceremonies of human device, while an utter stranger to real vital religion. Happier, a thousand times happier, the poor publican, when abasing himself in the dust; when smiting on his breast; when owning himself a sinner, and imploring the Divine mercy as his only hope! Lord, we equally need it: May we with equal humility seek it! May we habitually maintain those views of ourselves, which may promote that humility, so necessary in order to the acceptance of our addresses, and therefore to the happiness of our souls. And indeed, if in our approaches to God, we can place our confidence in any righteousness of our own, whatever we may imagine of our own knowledge or holiness, we have need to be taught again the first principles of both, and are strangers to the essentials of religion.

Sect. Cxxx.

Christ opens the eyes of a man who was born blind; and the sanhedrin examine strictly into the evidence of the miracle. John IX. 1—23.

John IX. 1. Our Lord was now come to Jerusalem, at the feast of dedication, about the middle of December; and as he was passing along through

3 About the middle of December.] See John x. 22. and the note there, sect. cxxxiv. Notwithstanding all the pains which Mr. Whiston has taken, to prove that the cure of the blind man, of which we have an account here, happened several months before Christ discovered himself to him in the temple, and indeed at the preceding feast of tabernacles, I choose, with the generality of critics, to introduce it here; not merely that the thread of the story might not be interrupted, but because Mr. Whiston's which was blind from his birth.

2 And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?

3 Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.

4 I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work.

5 As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world.

Whiston's reasons (in his Harmony, p. 383) appear inconclusive. For I see not but all here recorded might happen within the compass of two or three days at most, nay, perhaps, of one single day. And it seems much more probable that ἔποικεν as he passed might be used here without any immediate reference to ἐποίκες, in the preceding verse, (John viii. ult. sect. cv.) than that when Christ was fleeing out of the temple in the hasty manner described there, his disciples as he passed away from his enemies, should put so nice a question to him (as in ver. 2), or that he should stand still to discourse with them; and to perform such a cure in so leisurely a manner, as it is plain this was done.

6 In a pre-existent state. Dr. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. in loc.) shews, that some Rabbis have wildly fancied a child might sin in its mother's womb: but most commentators, with juster reason, agree that this refers to the notion the Jews had of the transmigration of souls. They thought that if a man behaved himself amiss he was afterwards sent into another body, where he met with great calamities, and lived on much worse terms than before; whereas a more advantageous situation than the former was supposed the reward of distinguished virtue: a notion which they borrowed from the Pythagoreans; which seems to be hinted at by Josephus, and is plainly referred to, Wisd. viii. 19, 20. (Compare Mat. xiv. 2, xvi. 14.)—Perhaps the disciples might put this question on purpose to learn our Lord's sentiments on this subject of curious speculation; but he wisely declined an express decision of the matter, to fix on something more useful.

6 Now when he had spoken thus, that he might exercise the faith and obedience of the patient, and might shew that he could command efficacy on whatever means he should please to use, he spat on the ground, and made clay with the spittle, and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay: And then, for a farther trial of his resignation and submission he said to him, Go, wash at the pool of Siloam; (which word Siloam being interpreted from the Hebrew, signifies Sent, and so bore some analogy to the character of Jesus, as sent of God.) He therefore presently consented with the direction, and went away, and washed as he was ordered, and had no sooner done it, but he came from the pool seeing; and not only found his sight given him, but his eyes were at once so remarkably strengthened, that he immediately could bear the light.

8 John ix. 5. The neighbours therefore, and they who had seen him before, and known that he was always blind, said one to another, Is not this he that sat in the street, and asked [charity] of those who passed by? Whence is there such an astonishing alteration in him? And some said, It is assuredly he; and others, It is indeed very much like him, yet it cannot be the person himself: but he said, and confidently averred, Truly I am the very man. They therefore said to him, How then were thine eyes opened, which we know to have been blind? (Wash at the pool of Siloam.) Perhaps by this command our Lord intended to make the miracle so much the more taken notice of, for a crowd of people would naturally gather round him, to observe the event of so strange a prescription. And as it is exceeding probable that the blind man had a guide to lead him, especially through the streets of so populous a city, he might naturally mention the errand they were going upon, and call those that saw him to a greater attention. Accordingly this miracle was afterwards talked of with particular regard: John xi. 37. sect. cxi. As for the pool of Siloam, it was supplied from the fountain of that name which arose in the south-west part of Jerusalem. See note c on Luke xiii. 4. p. 8. and Reland, Palestin. p. 857.

11 He answered and said, A man that is called Jesus, made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said unto me, Go to the pool of Siloam, and wash: and I went and washed, and I received sight.

12 Then said they unto him, Where is he? He said, I know not.

13 They brought to the Pharisees him that afore-time was blind.

14 And it was the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes.

15 Then again the Pharisees also asked him, how he had received his sight. He said unto them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see.

16 Therefore said some of the Pharisees, This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath-day. Others said, How can a man that is a sinner, do such miracles? And to have been blind? Could any medicine have so strange an effect? And he replied, A certain man, who is called Jesus, and who is famous for many other extraordinary works, made clay by spitting on the ground, and, having anointed mine eyes with it, said to me, Go to the pool of Siloam and wash there: and accordingly I went and washed, and immediately received my sight; and this is, in a few words, a true and exact account of this wonderful fact.

Then said they to him, Where is he that performed this, and gave thee such directions? And he said, I do not know; for I have never yet seen him, nor ever conversed with him, otherwise than as I just now told you. And they brought him who had formerly been blind to the Pharisees in the grand sanhedrin, that he might be examined by them; that so, if there was any fraud in the matter, they might discover and expose it. Now it was on the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, in the manner before related, and opened his eyes; which was a circumstance that some of these hypocritical rulers pretended to take great offence at. The Pharisees therefore, disposed to find all the fault they could, asked him again, how, or by what means, he received his sight. And he said to them, exactly as he had before declared to the people, He only put clay upon mine eyes, and then, according to his command, went and washed at the neighbouring pool of Siloam, and behold, I do now see perfectly well. Then said some of the Pharisees, This man, though apparently possessed of some extraordinary power, is not, to be sure, a messenger of God, nor can he perform these works by a Divine agency, because he observeth not the sacred rest of the sabbath, which the law of God so expressly enjoins. But others more wisely said, How can a man that is a notorious sinner and sabbath-breaker, as you suppose this man to be, do such great and beneficial miracles, which wear all [Such great and beneficial miracles.] This seems to intimate that they thought there were at least some miracles so glorious, and so benevolent, that no evil agent would have either inclination or power to perform them; and that they reckoned this in that number. The thought seems both rational and important, and is set in a very strong light by the learned Mr Chapman, in his Eusebius, chap. ii.

[It was on the sabbath-day, &c.] Dr. Lightfoot (in his Hor. Heb. on ver. 6) has shown, that anointing the eyes on the sabbath-day with any kind of medicine was forbidden to the Jews by the tradition of the elders.

17 But, to prevent the offence that might be taken at their dispute, they turned and said again to the blind man (that is, to him who had been blind, and still was spoken of by that title), What sayest thou concerning him, since he hath, as thou declarest, opened thine eyes? And he freely said, It is clear to me that he is a most illustrious Prophet; for surely otherwise he would have been unable to perform so great a miracle.

18 The Jews therefore of this great council, being generally displeased with his reply, and yet unable to invalidate it if the miracle was allowed, would not believe concerning him on his own credit, that he had formerly been blind, and had now received his sight; but represented it as a confederacy between him and Jesus, by an easy fraud, to get the reputation of so extraordinary a cure: and in this view they went on roundly to censure it, till they had called in the parents of the man, who maintained that he had thus received his sight, that they might strictly examine them on this question. And they asked them, saying, Is this indeed your son, of whom it is reported that you say he was born blind? Give us an account of the whole matter; and particularly tell us if you are sure that he was blind from his birth, how then doth he now see? His parents answered them and said, We assuredly know that this is our son; and affirm it to be true that he was born blind, and hath continued so from his infancy: But as for this strange fact, how he now sees, we know not; or who has opened his eyes we know not any more than he has told us, not being present when the cure was wrought: he is himself of a sufficient age to answer such a question; if you please therefore to ask him, he will undoubtedly speak concerning himself; and is best able to tell you his own story.

19 And they asked them, saying, Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? How then doth he now see?

20 His parents answered them and said, We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind:

21 But by what means he now seeth, we know not; or who hath opened his eyes, we know not; he is of age, ask him, he shall speak for himself.

22 These things his parents said in this cautious manner, not that they had any doubt of the cure as

The few friends of Christ among them, &c.] If Nicodemus, and Joseph of Arimathea, both members of the sanhedrin, were now present, they would naturally distinguish themselves on this occasion; and Gamaliel too, on the principles he afterwards avowed (Acts v. 38, 39), must have been on their side.

as wrought by Jesus, but because they were afraid of the Jews: for the Jews, in this their highest court, had already agreed, that if any one should shew such a regard to Jesus of Nazareth as to confess him to be Christ, he should immediately be excommunicated and cast out of the synagogue; a censure which was reckoned very infamous, and attended with many civil incapacities and penalties. Not knowing therefore but such an interpretation might be put on their owning the truth of this miracle, his parents declined giving any particular testimony concerning it; and rather chose to refer them to their son, and said, He is of age sufficient to be heard as an evidence, and it will therefore be most proper that you should ask the particulars from him.

On that the zeal of our great Master might quicken us his too Ver. 5. negligent servants! Still is he the light of the world, by his doctrines, precepts, and example. May our eyes by Divine grace be opened to see, and our hearts be disposed to love and to follow this light! It was a governing maxim with him, and he meant it also for our admonition, I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh, wherein no man can work. We are sent into the world on an important errand, to work out our own salvation, and that of others: may we improve the present day; and so much the rather, as we see the night approaching! On some the shadows of the evening are already drawing on; and as to others, their sun may go down at noon. Let us therefore, waving the curiosity of unprofitable speculations, apply ourselves seriously to the business of life, and zealously seize every oppor-

Our Lord, as it should seem unasked, and by the person on 6, 7—whom it was wrought unknown, performed this important and extraordinary cure. And the manner in which he did it is worthy of notice: He anointed his eyes with clay, and then commanded him to wash. Clay laid on the eye-lids might almost blind a man that had sight; but what could it do towards curing blindness? It reminds reminds us that God is no farther from the accomplishment of any purpose or event when he works with than without means; and that all the creatures are only that which his almighty operation makes them.

1 If any one should confess him to be Christ, &c. Hence it appears, that though our Lord was cautious of professing himself to be the Christ in express terms, yet many understood the intimations he gave; and that most of his disciples by this time declared their faith in him under that character. It also farther appears from hence, that the parents, and indeed this sanhedrim, knew who it was that opened this man's eyes, though he himself was hitherto a stranger to him, and was not yet acquainted with the dignity of his person. Compare ver. 25, 36.

7 The blind man believed, and received the immediate benefit of it. Had he reasoned, like Naaman on the impropriety of the means, he had justly been left in darkness. Lord, may our proud hearts be subdued to the methods of thy recovering grace! And may we leave it to thee to choose how thou wilt bestow favours, which it is our highest interest on any terms to receive.

15, 17 It must be a satisfaction to every true Christian to observe the curiosity and exactness with which these Pharisees inquired into the miracles of Christ, and how thoroughly they canvassed every circumstance of them. A truth like this need not fear any examination. Every new witness which they heard confirmed the case, and confounded the obstinacy of their unbelief.—But surely the weakness of the parents was very pitiable, who, in the midst of the evidence and obligation of such a miracle, were more afraid of incurring a human sentence than of offending God by failing to own so great a favour, and to confess the blessed Person by whom it was wrought. The fear of man bringeth a snare (Prov. xxix. 25); but they whose eyes Christ has opened in a spiritual sense will see a glory and excellence in him which will animate them boldly to bear their testimony to him, in defiance of all the censures which men can pass, or of all the penalties by which they can enforce them.

SECT. CXXXI.

The man who was born blind that had received his sight is a second time examined before the sanhedrin, who, provoked by the freedom of his replies, excommunicate him; but Jesus meets him, and declares himself to be the Son of God. John IX. 24—38.

John IX. 24.

Now, as the sanhedrin were not able to discover any fraud in the miracle mentioned in the preceding section by examining the parents, they therefore called a second time for the man who had been blind, and said to him, Give glory to God, by a free confession of the fraud, if there be any collusion or artifice in this affair; or if the cure was really wrought in the manner

a Give glory to God, by a free confession of the fraud, &c. As it is greatly for the honour of the Divine omniscience and providence that persons who are guilty of crimes not fully proved against them should freely confess them, and not presume, manner thou affirmest, acknowledge the power, sovereignty and goodness, of the Divine Being in working by so unworthy an instrument; for we certainly know that this Jesus of Nazareth, the man of whom thou speakest, is a profigate sinner; and deserves public punishment rather than esteem.

Then answered he and said, if he be a sinner, I know not any thing of it, having no personal acquaintance with him; but one thing I certainly know, and will stand to the truth of it, that whereas I was blind, even from my birth, I now see perfectly well, and owe my sight to the very person whom you condemn.

But they again said to him, hoping that, in some minute circumstance at least, he might contradict his former account, and give them some advantage against him, Tell us once more, as particularly as thou canst, what did he unto thee? and how did he open thine eyes?

And as the man perceived that they intended only to insnare him, he answered and said eagerly, I have told you already, and ye have not regarded what I said, nor would at all believe me: why would you desire to hear it again? Would you also become his disciples, as many have lately done, and some, perhaps, on occasion of this miracle which he has performed on me?

The Pharisees then were filled with indignation, and were so greatly exasperated at what appeared to them so insolent a speech, that they reviled him in very opprobrious language, and said, Thou art indeed this fellow's disciple, as many of the herd of ignorant people are; but we would have thee to know that we scorn the imputation, for we are the disciples of Moses', and 25 He answered and said, Whether he be a sinner, or no, I know not: one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see.

26 Then said they to him again, What did he to thee? how opened he thine eyes?

27 He answered them, I have told you already, and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again? will ye also be his disciples?

28 Then they reviled him, and said, Thou art his disciple! but we are Moses' disciples.

some, against the dictates of conscience, to maintain their own innocence; there is a great propriety in the phrase taken in this sense; (compare Josh. vii. 19, and Rev. xi. 13.) Yet some have taken it as a general adjuration by the glorious name of God; as 1 Kings xxii. 16; 2 Chron. xvii. 13; and Mat. xxvi. 63.—The words also admit another sense, which I have comprehended in the paraphrase; but I prefer the former.

b This man is a sinner.] I cannot, with Mr. Locke (Reasonableness of Christianity, p. 28), imagine this any proof of a tradition among the Jews that the Messiah should be perfectly free from sin; but rather conclude that sinner here, as ver. 16, signifies a notoriously wicked man. It was certain from the principles of their sacred writings, that a person not entirely sinless might perform very illustrious miracles. But how severe an insult was here on the character of our Redeemer, to be pronounced a known scandalous sinner, by this high court of judicature! An infamy which has seldom, in any civilized country, fallen on any person not legally convicted.

c We are the disciples of Moses.] Hereby they craftily, but most maliciously and falsely, insinuated that there was such an opposition between Moses and Jesus, that it was impossible for the same persons to be the disciples of both.
and are too firmly attached to that great and holy prophet to regard such a deceiver as this. We well know that God spake to Moses, and gave the most ample evidence of sending him with a Divine commission; but as for this man, we know not from whence he is, nor can we perceive any satisfactory credentials of his bringing any message from God to us.

But, not discouraged by their unjust reflections, the man replied with a becoming freedom of spirit, and said unto them, Why, in this respect it is strange that you know not from whence he is, and yet it is plain that he has opened mine eyes.

Now we all know in general that God heareth not sinners, and that persons of infamous characters and immoral lives cannot expect the Divine acceptance in any common petition which they offer, much less for the performance of a miracle; but if any man be truly devout, and faithfully do his will, him indeed he heareth with a favourable regard: when therefore God is found to hear a man in such an extraordinary instance as this, there seems the greatest reason to believe he is a person whose temper and character are approved by him. And this is plainly an extraordinary instance; for from the beginning of the world it was never heard that any man opened the eyes of one who, like me was born blind. It is surprising, therefore, that you, who allow that Moses was a prophet, on the authority of his miracles, should in this case judge so hardly of my deliverer, whoever he be.

But every unprejudiced person may easily see that if this man were not sent of God, he could do nothing of this kind.

And, not being able to endure so plain and forcible a reproof, which even stung them to the heart, they answered and said to him, with great hatred and scorn, Thou vile presumptuous wretch, thou wast entirely born in sins, and didst bring into the world with thee most evident tokens of Divine wrath and vengeance; and dost thou insolently take upon thee to teach us, the guides

Their partiality here was inexcusable; for if they believed the mission of Moses, on the evidence of miracles, credibly attested indeed, but performed two thousand years before they were born; it was much more reasonable, on their own principles, to believe the mission of Jesus, on at least equal miracles, wrought daily among them, when they might in many instances have been eye-witnesses to the facts; and one of which, notwithstanding all their malice, they were here compelled to own, or at least found themselves utterly unable to disprove.

55 Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God?

56 He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him?

57 And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee.

35 Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God?

56 He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him?

37 And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee.

38 And he said, Lord, I believe. And he worshipped him.

Improvement.

So little does truth fear repeated examination; and thus does Ver. iv, after every trial, come forth like pure gold out of the furnace. 24—27 So did this miracle of Christ appear to these subtle adversaries;
Jesus reproves the blindness of the Pharisees.

so will the Christian cause appear to all who will diligently search into its evidence.

28, 29 Who can forbear wondering at the obstinacy of these Pharisees; and, on the same principles, at that of the present Jews, who, while they acknowledge that God spake by Moses, because he wrought miracles, will not, on the evidence of yet more various and glorious miracles, and those attested beyond all contradiction, acknowledge the authority of the Son of God himself?

30 But we see this poor illiterate creature (for such he undoubtedly was,) with the advantage of truth on his side, baffles all the sophistry of his most learned antagonists. Great is the truth, and it will prevail. Great is this truth, so fundamental to the gospel, that Jesus is the Son of God: and this also, which is so important to natural religion and revealed, that God heareth not sinners; but if any man be a worshipper of God, and do his will, him he hears, and most favourably regards. May we be truly devout, and add to our devotion an obedient regard to the Divine will, and the eyes of the Lord will be upon us, and his ears be open to our cry!

34 (Psal. xxxiv. 15.) Then, being favourably owned of God, we shall have no reason to fear the censures of men. If they cast us out, Christ will receive us, and perhaps reveal himself to us with more freedom, in proportion to the injuries we sustain from them.

sect. CXXXII.

Christ admonishes the Pharisees of their danger; and represents himself as the door of the sheepfold through which men must necessarily enter, if they desire their own salvation, or that of others committed to their care. John IX. 39, to the end; X. 1—10.

John IX. 39.

While Jesus stood talking with the blind man who had received his sight, several people, who were then entering into the temple, knowing them both, and desirous to hear what passed, gathered together about them: and Jesus said, so that they all might hear him, You may see in this man, and in what has happened in relation to him, an illustration of the effects which my appearance is to produce: for I am come into this world for judgment as well as mercy:

And Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world; that they which see not, might see; and that they which see, might be made blind.
mercy; that, on the one hand, they who see not, might see, or that the ignorant souls, who are willing to be instructed, might learn Divine Knowledge; and, on the other hand, that they who see, may be made blind; that such as are proudly conceited of their own science and wisdom may either be humbled or exposed; and they who wilfully stand out, and harden their hearts against my instructions, may bring upon themselves yet greater darkness.

And [some] of the Pharisees who were then present with him, heard these things, and apprehending that he glanced at them, said to him, Are we also blind? and dost thou mean to insinuate any thing of that kind? If thou dost, speak plainly. Now this they said, hoping thereby to draw him into some dangerous reflection on the sanhedrin, who had lately passed their censure on the man whose eyes he had opened.

Jesus said to them, If you were indeed blind, and laboured under unavoidable ignorance, you would not then have any sin in comparison of what you now have; but now you say, Surely, we see much more clearly than the rest of mankind, therefore your sin abides upon you with greater aggravation; and this conceit which you have of your own knowledge hinders conviction, and prevents the first entrance of instruction into your minds.

Nevertheless, whether you will hear, or whether you will forbear, I will for a while longer continue my admonitions; and therefore, verily, verily, I say unto you who call yourselves the shepherds of the people, That he who enters not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.

But he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep.
He is the door by which we are to enter in.

appointed way. To him, as soon as he approaches, the door-keeper opens the fold; and the sheep themselves hear his voice with regard; and he is well acquainted with each of them, insomuch that he calls each of his own sheep by name, and leads them out to pasture. And when he thus puts forth his own sheep from the fold, he himself goes before them, to guide them to good pastures, and to defend them from any danger which may occur; and the sheep cheerfully follow him; for they well know his voice, being daily accustomed to it. But if a stranger come to lead them out, they will not follow him; but, on the contrary, they will fly away from him, because they do not know the voice of strangers.

This short parable Jesus spake unto them; but they did not understand what it was that he said to them, but were quite at a loss to conjecture his meaning; though his intent in describing the character of the good Shepherd was plainly to shew how far the Pharisees, who assume the name, were from answering it; and to warn the true sheep, or persons of real integrity and simplicity, of the danger of being blindly governed and guided by them.

Then Jesus, to clear up what was most obscure in his former discourse, said to them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, and solemnly assure you, that, however you neglect me, I am the door of the sheep, and it is only by authority derived

b The door-keeper opens the fold.] Grosstus does not attempt the accommodation of this circumstance: Mr. Cradock interprets it of the Holy Ghost; and Dr. Whitby of God the Father, as giving free admission to those teachers who maintained a due regard to Christ: an interpretation which seems much more reasonable than to refer it (as some do) to ministers.—It is suggested by Sir Isaac Newton, that, as these words were spoken near the temple, where sheep were kept in folds to be sold for sacrifices, Christ here alludes to what was peculiar in these folds; that, as they were kept locked, they not only excluded the thief, but the shepherd, till the door-keeper opened them. (See Newton on Prop. p. 148.) But I cannot think, whatever occasion Christ might take from the sight of sheep to represent his people under that image, and himself as a Shepherd, he would describe them like sheep shut up in a pen to be sold for sacrifice; nor does the shepherd's leading them out, &c. agree with this circumstance. In countries where there were so many savage beasts it might be ordinarily necessary to have the folds better secured than among us; and the chief shepherd might often leave a servant to watch them while thus shut up, and come himself to lead them out to pasture in a morning. c Calls his own sheep by name.] Dr. Hammond justly infers from hence, that the eastern shepherds, at least those of Judea, gave particular names to their sheep, as most men do to their dogs and horses.—Their custom also was to lead the sheep, playing on some musical instrument.

a I am the door, &c.] It would be very impertinent to run a long parallel here between Christ and a door. The resemblance plainly centres in this one circumstance; that as a man must observe and pass through the door, in order to his making a regular and unsuspected entrance into a sheepfold; so he must maintain a proper regard derived from me that the people of God are to be taught and fed. All that ever came before me, assuming the Messiah's character, or setting up for a despotic authority in the church, and teaching other methods of salvation than by me, are thieves and robbers, persons of very bad designs, who had no warrant from above for what they did; and, whatsoever their pretences were, their administration has a fatal tendency to make havoc of the souls they should watch and feed; but the true sheep, or those who are sincere and well-disposed persons, have not heard them, so as to relish and regard their doctrine. I therefore repeat it again, as a most important truth, That I myself am the door, and if any one enter in by me and acknowledge my authority, he shall be, like a sheep in his fold, safe from the invasion of what might injure and destroy him; and shall go in and out under my care and guidance, and shall still find good pasture; that is, in consequence of his regard to me, and the enjoyment of communion with me, his soul shall be fed and nourished with true doctrine, and shall obtain substantial happiness. For whereas the thief only comes that he may steal, and kill, and destroy; I am come for the benefit of all my sheep, that they may have true life, and that at length they may have it yet more abundantly; a most plentiful provision being made for their everlasting comfort and happiness, even far beyond what has ever been known before.

IMPROVEMENT.

Let us hear, with an holy awe on our spirits, that the Lord Jesus Christ came into the world for purposes of judgment as well as regard to Christ, in order to his being a true teacher in the church, and must pass (as it were) through him, or by his authority, into his office. It is by a simile very near resembling this that Christ elsewhere calls himself the way, John xiv. 6, sect. clxiviii.

All that ever came before me, &c.] If it could be shown, by any proper authority, that προς μένος ever signifies in neglect of me, or ἀπόδειξις passing by a door, I should with Elsner (Observ. Vol. I. p. 327.) prefer that rendering to any other; but as this does not appear, it is evident that the words must be understood with the limitation added in the paraphrase: for otherwise they would imply such a reflection on Moses and the prophets as we know our Lord could never intend.—Perhaps he might refer to such persons as Judas of Galilee, or Theudas, who had been the occasion of destruction to their followers. See Acts v. 36, 57.

[That they may have it more abundantly.] To refer this latter clause, at least ultimately to the provision which Christ has made for the future and eternal happiness of all his people, seems best to suit the other parts of this discourse, as well as the genius of the whole Christian dispensation. Perhaps the word προστρέψει may intimate how much this provision exceeded that made by Moses.
Christ, as the good Shepherd, will die for the sheep.

John X. 7.

Let Christ be regarded by us as the door from whom all true teachers derive their authority, and to whom they direct their administrations; and let it be our care that we enter by this door. Let inferior shepherds learn their duty, so plainly suggested here: Let them learn to know their sheep, and take as particular notice as they can of each single person committed to their care; and let them go before them in all the paths of duty: for what could the greatest enemy to the flock do worse than to lead them by example into the paths of destruction?

9 Happy souls, who are entered in by this gate! Their safety, their confort, is secure; they enjoy a holy liberty and plenty, and going in and coming out they find pasture. If we are strangers to that entertainment and refreshment which arises from ordinances (those green pastures which Christ hath provided for his sheep in the wilderness,) we have, a great deal of reason to fear that we belong not to his flock. He came that his sheep might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly; that greater provision might be made for their instruction and consolation now, till they are brought to those better pastures he intends for them above: May his grace prepare us for them! and his hand will certainly conduct us to them; nor need we fear the darkest passage in our way.

SECT. CXXXIII.

Christ describes himself as the good shepherd, who will lay down his life for the sheep. John X. 11—21.

John X. 11.

Our Lord, having thus represented himself as the door of the sheep, and intimated the regards to be maintained towards him, particularly by those that professed themselves teachers of others, now changed the similitude, and said, I may also very properly add, that I am myself, by way of eminence, the good Shepherd, the Person frequently foretold in scripture

* I am the good Shepherd.] Lamy in his Harmony, p. 339) very justly supposes that there might be some allusion here to Isa. xi. 11. But nothing can be more precarious than the argument he seems to draw from hence for placing this discourse at the feast of tabernacles, even though it should be allowed that the xlvth of Isaiah was read in the synagogue at that time of the year: for it is certain our Lord does not confine himself to the lesson for the day in his quotations from scripture, or his allusions to it.
He knows his sheep, and will gather them into the fold.

12 But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth; and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep.

13 The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep.

14 I am the good Shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine.

15 As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the father: and I lay down my life for the sheep.

16 And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold.
The Jews are again divided in their sentiments about him.

which are not of this fold (meaning thereby the elect of God among the Gentiles;) them also must I at length bring in; and I know that they will hear and obey my voice, notwithstanding that ignorance, vice, and misery, in which they are now involved; and so, all being incorporated into one society, of which I am the Head, the Governor and Guardian there shall be one sheepfold, [and] one Shepherd.

17 And for this reason more especially does the Father love me, and approves it as an act of eminent duty and love to him, because I am come with this design into the world, to lay down my life for the redemption of my sheep, who are dear to him as well as to me, that I may take it again, and possess it for ever, to be employed for his glory and for the happiness of my people.

18 For though I am shortly to die by the hands of the most cruel enemies, yet no one deprives me of my life, or takes it from me against my will; for I have every moment a power to rescue myself at pleasure, and could even with mine expiring breath command immediate deliverance; but I will manifestly shew that I lay it down of myself, and voluntarily relinquish my body, sooner than my soul would in a course of nature have been dislodged from it; and this in me will be a very regular, though wonderful act; for, as I have life in myself (John v. 26.) I have full power and authority thus to lay it down when I shall think fit; and I have also power to resume it at pleasure, by entering into and quickening my body again. And indeed this commandment I have received of my Father, and shall ere long fulfil the charge in both its branches.

19 When our Lord uttered these remarkable expressions,

_17 Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again._

_18 No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself: I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again._

_19 There was a division_
Reflexions on the care of Christ for his sheep.

And many of them said, He hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him?

Others said, These are not the words of him that hath a devil: can a devil open the eyes of the blind?

There is not, perhaps, any where to be found a greater instance of the force of prejudice than in these perverse Jews, who censured Christ as a lunatic and a demoniac for one of the gravest and most excellent speeches that was ever delivered. Let us review it with all due attention and regard.

Let us consider Christ as the good Shepherd, and humbly commit our souls to him, as ever we desire they should be safe and happy. We have known his kind regards to the flock in exposing and laying down his life for them. And he hath not laid it down in vain. Delightful thought! Our compassionate Shepherd, even when the sword of the Lord was awakened to smite him, has not so fallen as to rise no more; but as in this great and good work he voluntarily laid down, so he has also re-assumed his life; and still bears on his heart the same concern for his flock, and uses his renewed life and exalted dignity for their security and happiness.

Let us humbly acknowledge him as acknowledged by the Father: let us courageously and gratefully own him, and be ready to lay down our lives also for him. We are those other sheep, of whom he spake, who were not originally of the fold, but by his grace are now brought in to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls. Let us pray that the boundaries of his fold may be still more extended, and the whole number of his elect accomplished; that all the flock may at length appear together, and may be conducted by him to the regions of that immortal life which he determines to give it.
In the mean time let us maintain all proper regards to him, and especially the most cheerful confidence in his care; repeating Ver. with evangelical views, and so with a peculiar sublimity of sense, those words of David as our own, (Psal. xxiii. 1—4.) "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want: he maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters: he restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake: yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me."

SECT. CXXXIV.

Christ, discoursing of his union with the Father, is charged with blasphemy; and, being assaulted by the Jews, retires beyond Jordan. John X. 22, to the end.

John X. 22.

NOW it may be proper to observe, that the time when these discourses were delivered by our Lord was the feast of dedication, which was observed at Jerusalem in memorial of the purification of the temple after it had been polluted by the idolatries and impieties of Antiochus; and consequently it was winter. And, to shelter himself from the inclemencies of the weather, Jesus was then walking in the covered walk that went round the temple, and was now in that part of it which was called Solomon's porch.

23 Then several of the Jews surrounded him, and said unto him, How long dost thou hold us in an anxious a The feast of dedication.] As it is expressly said this feast was in winter, it is plain it could not be observed in remembrance of the dedication of Solomon's temple, which was just after harvest (1 Kings viii. 42.) nor of that of Nehemiah's, which was in the spring (Ezra vi. 15, 16.) but the feast here intended must be that instituted by Judas Maccabaeus on his having purified the temple and altar from the pollutions and idolatries of Antiochus Epiphanes. This was celebrated every year for eight days successively, in the month of December (1 Mac. iv. 52, 59.) and is mentioned by Josephus as a festival to which great regard was paid in his time. See Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 7 (al. 11), 8, 7, and Selden. de Senecl. lib. iii. cap. 12, § 7.

b Solomon's porch.] Josephus informs us (Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 3 (al. 2), § 2, 9, and lib. xx. cap. 9 (al. 8), § 7) that Solomon, when he built the temple (finding the area of Mount Zion too small to answer his magnificent plan), filled up a part of the adjacent valley, and built an outward porch over it towards the east. This was a most noble structure, supported by a wall 400 cubits high, and consisting of stones of a vast bulk, each stone (as it is said) being twenty cubits long and six cubits high. And Josephus speaks of it as continuing even to the time of Albinus and Agrippa, which was several years after the death of Christ. This is called Solomon's porch, Acts iii. 11. and v. 12.
How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly.

25 Jesus answered them, I told you, and ye believed not: the works that I do in my Father’s name, they bear witness of me.

29 But ye believe not; because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you.

27 My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me.

28 And I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand.

29 My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all: and none is able to pluck them out of my Father’s hand.

30 I and my Father are one.

anxious and uneasy suspense? If thou art indeed the Messiah tell us so plainly and expressly: which they said with a malicious design to ensnare and accuse him.

And Jesus answered them, I have in effect told you over and over: yet, you believe me not; and, had I offered nothing more, the works which I do in my Father’s name sufficiently declare it, as it is clearly to be seen that they bear witness of me in a language which you would easily understand if you were to judge impartially. But you do not believe, because you are not persons of such simplicity and sincerity as I described under the character of my sheep. For, as I said unto you but just now (ver. 4; 14, 16), My sheep hear my voice and I know and take care of them; and they, like sheep accustomed to their shepherd, acknowledge and follow me. And the consequence of that will be such as would make it well worth your while to lay aside all these prejudices, and to join with them: for I give unto them an invaluable blessing, even eternal life; and guard them with such almighty power and constant care, that they shall never perish, neither shall any enemy, be he ever so subtle, or ever so outrageous, be able to pluck them out of my hand, or injure them while they remain in it. Nor indeed is it possible that any should; for my Father, who gave them to me on purpose that I might redeem and save them, is confessedly greater than all; and therefore they must needs be safe, as none is able to pluck them out of my Father’s hand. Now it is a most certain truth that I and the Father are one: and the union between us is so strict and intimate,

I have in effect told you over and over.] What he had been just saying of himself, in the preceding verses, as the great Shepherd, was in sense equivalent to a declaration of his being the Messiah.—I mention that discourse as what had just been delivered, because I think it most natural to explain the 22d verse as referring to what was said before, and not merely to what follows: for else the evangelist would probably have said, After these things was the feast of dedication: Compare John v. 1. vi. 4. and vii. 1, 2.

Neither shall any enemy pluck them, &c.] This is the plain import and energy of the original (καὶ ἐξουσίας αὐτοῦ), which is greatly enervated by adding the word man in the translation, as the authors of our English version have frequently done. (Compare Mat. xi. 27. Mark xiii. 5. and Jam. i. 13.) The sheep of Christ are exposed to so great danger from the infernal lion (1 Pet. v. 8) that I doubt not but this text most eminently refers to the care of their Shepherd to guard them from his assaults.

I and the Father are one.] If we attend, not only to the obvious meaning of these words in comparison with other passages of Scripture, but to the connection of this celebrated text, it so plainly demonstrates the Deity of our blessed Redeemer, that I think it may be left to speak for itself, without any laboured comment. How widely different that sense is in which Christians are said to be one with God (John intimate, in nature as well as in affection and design, that his almighty power is mine, to be employed for the defence of my sheep; and no one can deprive them of eternal life without prevailing against him as well as me.

31 Then the Jews, transported with rage, took up some of the stones which lay in the court of the temple, where they were still repairing some of the buildings, and armed themselves with them again, as they had formerly done, (John viii. 59. Vol. I. p. 545), in order to stone him.

32 But Jesus, with his usual mildness and strength of reason, answered them, I have shewed you many good works from my Father; and for which of these works do you go about to stone me? or what have I ever done among you but acts of beneficence and kindness?

33 The Jews replying, said unto him, Whatever thy other works have been, it is very apparent, from what has just now passed, that we do not stone thee for a good work, but for the most detestable blasphemy; even because thou, being only a wretched, mortal, sinful man, makest thyself God; pretending to be one with him in so extraordinary a manner, that his omnipotence and other divine perfections are thine.

34 Jesus, not judging it proper at that time to bring the sublime doctrine of his Deity into farther debate, answered them, Is it not written in your law, or in those sacred books which you own to be of Divine original, (Psal. lxxxii. 6.) where it is plain the persons that are spoken of are princes and magistrates, "I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the Most High?" Now if the Psalmist thus applied this character, and it appears he called them gods, to whom the word of God then came, merely with regard to that office which by Divine designation they bore (and certainly the scripture cannot be broken, nor can you, with any shew of reason, pretend to censure the propriety of those expressions which a divinely inspired writer has used); How is it then that you are so offended now; or how do you pretend to say

(John xvii. 21), will sufficiently appear by considering how flagrantly absurd and blasphemous it would be to draw that inference from their union with God which Christ does from his.

[To whom the word of God came.] I apprehend the coming of the word of God to them which is here mentioned refers to the message then delivered to them in the name of God, rather than, in the general, to their receiving a commission from him: but the difference is not very material.
He escapes from the Jews, and goes beyond Jordan.

whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God?

37 If I do not the works of my Father, belive me not.

38 But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know and believe, that the Father is in me, and I in him.

39 Therefore they sought again to take him: but he escaped out of their hand, 40 And went again beyond Jordan, into the place where John at first baptized; and there he abode.

When you allow—magistrates, &c.—A late learned and pious paraphrast apprehends that our Lord here vindicates his claim to supreme divinity by pleading that the Jewish rulers are called gods, not in a general regard to their office as rulers, but as types of the Messiah, the great Sovereign of the church, who (as it is expressed at the close of this lxxxiv. psalm) was to inherit all nations. But not to urge that it seems improbable that such wicked magistrates as are there spoken of should be described as types of Christ, this explication seems to imply, that every person whose office was typical of the Messiah might be called a God; and on the other hand, that a creature's being called by that name, would intimate, that he was a typical person; the consequences of which I am sure that worthy writer would abhor. (Compare 2 Cor. vi. 4.) I think myself therefore obliged to acquiesce in that plain and natural sense of the passage, which the generality of commentators, both ancient and modern, have given. Jesus was charged here by the Jews with ascribing divinity to his human nature; and in reply to this he shews, that calling himself the Son of God did not imply that; and that his works proved such an union of the human nature with the divine, as he had before asserted; than which no answer could have been more wise and pertinent.
Reflections on our safety under the care of Christ.

for a while, till the fury of the multitude was a little abated. And many of the inhabitants of that place who had been formerly acquainted with the Baptist, and remembered the strong and repeated testimonies which he had borne to Jesus, came to him there, to attend upon his preaching, and said among themselves, John indeed did no miracle himself; but he foretold extraordinary things of another; and we now find, that all the things which John said of this man were exactly true, which is a Divine attestation to the mission and authority of both. And many of them believed on him there, and happily improved this little season of recess among them, as the means of their instruction and establishment in piety.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. It is worthy of remark, that we here see our Lord Jesus at a festival, appointed only by human authority, in commemoration of a national deliverance. He came from Galilee to observe it in the temple, though it was winter; and brought with him, as at all times, a heart glowing with the most ardent and amiable zeal, for the honour of God, and the salvation of men, even of those who were studying to insnare and destroy him.

What prudence, mingled with spirit and sweetness, runs through his answers to them! What inestimable blessings does he propose, to invite them to enter into his fold? May we never forget those gracious words! May we ever be entitled to all the comfort of them! I give unto my sheep eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. Lord, may we be found in the number of those secure and happy souls, even of those who know thee, and who obey thy voice, and follow thee, whithersoever thou leadest them by thine example, thy Providence, and thy Spirit! Then may we look on our eternal life and happiness, as inviolably secure. Safely indeed may we trust it in his hands, who could say, in so sublime, and so glorious a sense, I and the Father are one. The enemies of our salvation must triumph then over Omnipotence itself, before they can wrest the sheep of Christ out of his hands; nor will his fidelity to God, or his love to them, suffer them to be seduced by fraud, any more than destroyed by violence.

Blessed situation of thy little flock! O thou faithful, thou compassionate, thou Almighty Shepherd, gather thou our souls with theirs; and never suffer us to forget of how great importance it is, that we still continue near thee, that we look up to thee for our defence defence and safety, and confide not in our own power and wisdom, but in thine!

Who could have imagined, that any heart could have been so base as to have intended evil, or any hands so cruel, as to have armed themselves with instruments of death, against such a person, while speaking such words as these? Yet behold, these Jesus do it; and that even in so sacred a place, as the temple itself; as the genuine offspring of those, who slew the prophet and priest of the Lord, even at his altar. (Compare Mat. xxiii. 31, 35. and Luke xi. 48, 51.) but his wise and gentle reply disarmed them for a few 32 months; and the Divine care and power in an extraordinary manner provided for his escape, and once more rescued him from their 39 murderous hands.

Happy the inhabitants of the country about Jordan, to which he retired! especially happy, in that they knew the day of their visitation! The testimony of John the Baptist is now recollected to 41, 42 excellent purposes, though he himself was mouldering in his tomb: Nor is there any thing, which a faithful Minister will more earnestly desire, than that even while dead, he may yet speak, for the honour of Christ, and the salvation of souls.

Christ declares against divorces, except in the case of adultery, and adds some other particulars relating to the married state. Mat. XIX. 1—12. Mark X. 1—12.

AND after the instructions that were given by our Lord to his disciples at Capernaum, (which were recorded above, from sect. xciii. to xcvi.) it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished these discourses, he arose from thence, and departed from Galilee, where he had dwelt so long, and through which he had made such repeated a When Jesus had finished these discourses. The passages which Matthew and Mark have mentioned, immediately before they introduce this story, are those discourses on humility and the forgiveness of injuries, which have been considered above, from sect. xciii. to xcvi. And I have sometimes been inclined to think, that this, and the next following sections, might have been introduced there, as previous to that feast of tabernacles, which we have so often mentioned. But most harmonizers without any scruple or apology place them here, being determined, I suppose, by the close connection between the passages that are here related, and those events that follow them, which happened but a very little while before Christ's death. It is of very little importance to us, whether these discourses were delivered now or a few months before. However, he might truly be said to arise from Galilee, and come into these parts, though he took a considerable compass, and spent several weeks in the journey. Compare note b, on Luke ii. 29, Vol. I. p. 75.

repeated journeys. And after he had first been up at Jerusalem, (as was before related, John vii. 10. Vol. I. p. 511.) and several other things had happened, which have already been considered in their proper place, he came at length (as was observed in the last section, John x. 40.) into the borders of Judea, beyond Jordan, where he spent some of the winter months, crossing the river, as he saw occasion. And his arrival was no sooner known, but great multitudes followed him from all the neighbouring parts; and particularly the people who had seen him formerly at Bethabara resorted to him again; (as was said John x. 41.) and according to his usual custom, he readily embraced the opportunity of preaching to them, and taught them there again, as he had done elsewhere; and as they brought many sick persons to him, he healed them all there; which could not but increase the throng.

And the Pharisees, who always had a watchful eye on his motions, and attended him with the most malignant designs, being now more especially irritated by the fame of his late miracles, which they had in vain endeavoured to suppress, (see John vii. 32, 47. and ix. 16, 24.) came hither also to him, with the view of getting some advantage over him, by tempting him with what they thought a very artful and insinuating question: And that they might, if possible, entangle him in his talk, so as to find some reason to accuse him, or to discredit him at least among the people, they asked him, saying unto him, What thinkest thou, Master, Is it lawful for a man to dismiss his wife for every slight cause of dislike, which may be found in her? or is adultery the only just reason for a divorce?

Beyond Jordan.] Mark has expressed this with some little variation, ἐν τοῖς ἄνω οἰκονομαῖς, by the farther side of Jordan; or, as the learned Beza, and some other critics choose to render it, on the banks of Jordan; and this may seem to be more suitable to what is said of Christ coming to the coast of Judea, which was bounded by Jordan, and had no coasts beyond it. But it appears from John x. 40, that Bethabara, where John at first baptized, (John i. 28.) was the place to which our Lord removed, which was undoubtedly beyond Jordan, and over against Jericho. (Compare Josh. iii. 16. and Jud. vii. 24.) And this was so near to the coasts of Judea, that we might very well retain the usual version, and take the phrase as Matthew hath expressed it; especially as it is probable, that Jesus during his abode in these parts might often cross the river, and pass from Bethabara to Judea, which lay on the opposite side.

c To dismiss his wife for every cause.] It is well known that there was a debate between the ancient rabbis, (perhaps as old as our Lord’s time,) concerning the interpretation of the law relating to divorce, Deut. xxiv. 1. The school of Samma maintained, that the words תָּחֵיתָהוּ דְּבַר which 4 And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that [God], he which made them [from the beginning of the creation] made them male and female? [Mark x. 6.]

5 And said, For this cause shall a man leave [his] father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh. [Mark x. 7, 8,—]

6 Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. [Mark x.—8, 9.]

7 They say unto him, Why did Moses, under Divine direction then in the Mosaic law, give a law permitting divorce for cause?—And he said to them in reply, Have ye not read, (Gen. ii. 24.) So that it appears of persons thus joined together, that they are no longer two, but one flesh, and should accordingly regard each other as members of one body. What God therefore has thus closely yoked together, let not man separate; but let the bond of marriage be esteemed as sacred, and incapable of being dissolved by any thing which does not make them cease to be one flesh, by making that of the one common to some third person. (See Whitby, in loc.)

which we render some uncleanness, signified adultery; whereas the school of Hillel explained it of any matter of dulness. (See Selden, Lex. Heb. lib. iii. cap. 22.) Perhaps a medium between both, would have been a juster interpretation than either; for it is certain, that the phrase may with peculiar propriety express any blemish or disorder, which a woman might unjustly and foolishly conceal before marriage, that was afterwards discovered. At least, I think it plain from our Lord's answer, that the disciples of Sama6 were mistaken; which farther appears from the provision the Mosaic law made for punishing adultery with death.—The interpretation of Hillel generally prevailed; and the Pharisees concluding Christ would, as he had done before, declare against divorces for trivial causes Mat. v. 31, 32, and Luke xvi. 18; might hope to expose him to popular resentment for re trenching a liberty which the law allowed; but our Lord feared not the consequence of doing it.

May in effect be looked upon as a Divine testimony.] I think the ingenious author of Revelation examined with Candour, solidly argues, from Adam's pronouncing concerning the obligation of a child's relation to its parent, which had never then existed, that he spake these words in consequence of some extraordinary Divine illumination; which justifies the turn given in the paraphrase: nor could he without a revelation have known what had passed in his sleep, or ever have conjectured the original of woman to have been what he so plainly refers to. See Revolat. exam. with Candour, Vol. i. Diss. iii. p. 28—33.
tion and inspiration, command "a man whose wife found no favour in his eyes, because he had discovered," as it is there expressed, "some uncleanness in her," or (as it has been generally understood) some cause of distaste and aversion, "to give her a bill of divorce, and so to dismiss her?" (Deut. xxiv. 1.)

And he replied, and said unto them, How is it that you take this matter; or what did you allege that Moses did command you? Is there any thing in his writings that recommends divorce and separation upon light occasions?

And upon this they said, If it may not be said that Moses does command or recommend it in itself, it is most evident from the passage we have mentioned, that he has permitted a man, in some cases, to write a bill of divorce, and to give it into his wife's hand, and dismiss her; on which foundation thou well knowest how frequently divorces prevail among us, and how justifiable they are generally esteemed.

And Jesus answered and said to them, You state the matter now more justly than before; for it amounts merely to a permission: but I must observe to you, that it was on account of the hardness of your hearts, and the perverseness of your tempers; that Moses wrote you this precept, [and] gave you such a permission to put away your wives; knowing that otherwise you might have been tempted to use them intolerably ill: but, as I just now told you, it was not so from the beginning; and the account which that writer gives of the original constitution of things proves it to be an irregularity, how necessary soever he might find it, in some cases, to tolerate it, or rather, by making it irrevocable, to prevent men's doing it without deep consideration.

And when the assembly was dismissed, and Jesus was retired from the multitude, as they were sitting together in the house where he lodged, his disciples asked him again of the same matter, as not being able fully to understand it, or to reconcile it with the precept of Moses.

And he says to them, If you are willing to receive laws from me, you must submit to a greater restraint then command to give a writing of divorce-ment, and to put her away.

And he answered and said unto them, What did Moses command you?

And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorce, and to put her away.

And Jesus answered and said unto them, Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, wrote you this precept, [and] suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. [Mark x. 5.]

And the assembly was dismissed, and Jesus was retired from the multitude, as they were sitting together in the house where he lodged, his disciples asked him again of the same matter.

And he saysto them, If you are willing to receive laws from me, you must submit to a greater restraint then command to give a writing of divorce-ment, and to put her away.

And he saith unto them, [I say unto you,]

* On account of the hardness of your hearts.] How much this was the character of the Jewish nation is too apparent. See Exod. xxxii. 3; xxxiv. 9; Deut. iv. 6; xxxi. 27; Isa. lxxiii. 4; Ezek. ii. 4; and Acts vii. 51.—Our Lord (as Grotius well observes) strongly intimates that a more tender disposition may justly be expected from his disciples.

* Except Marriage is objected to, but all cannot live single.

unto you], Whosoever shall put away his wife, [except it be for fornication], and [shall] marry another, comitteth adultery against her: [and whoso marrieth her which is put away, doth commit adultery.] [Mat. XIX. 9.]

12 And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she comitteth adultery.

Mat. XIX. 10. His disciples say unto him, If this be the case between a man and his wife, it is not good to marry.

11 But he said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given.

12 For there are some restraint than Moses laid on the Israelites; for I expressly tell you, (as I formerly did, Mat. v. 32, sect. xxxix. and Luke xvi. 18, sect. cxxiv.) Whosoever shall dismiss his wife, except [it be for whoredom], which is a fundamental breach of the main article of the marriage-covenant, by which they are one flesh, and shall marry another, comitteth adultery against her that was his former wife, and who continues still to be so in the sight of God; and he that shall marry her who is so dismissed, without a sufficient cause, comitteth adultery. And, on the other hand, by a parity of reason, if a woman, not injured in the important article just now mentioned, shall put away her husband, or extort from him a bill of divorce, and be married to another man, she comitteth adultery, and as she deserves to be abhorred by men, so must she expect to be punished by God, as guilty of that enormous and detestable crime, if she do not from her very heart repent of it.

Then his disciples say unto him, If this be the case between a man and his wife, and the bond be thus indissoluble, surely it is not expedient to marry; since a man may by that means be caught in an inextricable snare, which may make him miserable all the rest of his life.

But he said to them, All men cannot receive this saying of yours, that it is not expedient to marry; but only they to whom it is given, as a peculiar gift, to conquer those inclinations towards that state which God, for wise reasons, has wrought into the common constitution of human nature. For there are [some] eunuchs who were born so from their mother's womb, and whose natural

Though fornication committed before marriage, and afterwards discovered, might be supposed to justify a divorce, adultery must much more evidently do it; and therefore it is plain the word must be taken in the extent which is here given it. (See note for Mat. v. 32, Vol. I. p. 212.) But it is by a dangerous latitude of interpretation that Milton (Prose Works, page 105) would explain the word as signifying any thing which should be to the husband as grievous and intolerable as whoredom. The case of obstinate desertion, where the husband cannot by law recover his wife, which was the celebrated case of the pious Gaudens Caracciolus, and which we find to be supposed in 1 Cor. vii. 15, is quite of a different nature; nor can a man under such a calamity be said to put away his wife.—Erasmus has a remarkable note on Mat. xix. 3, which shows he was not far from Milton's opinion.

Though it is certain that the Jewish law did not put it into a woman's power to divorce her husband, it is plain from Josephus that it was done, not only by several ladies of distinguished rank, but even that his own wife did it (see Dr. Lardner's Credibility, part i. Vol. II. page 890, note 4), having probably learned of the Roman women, who in this age are known to have practised it in the most scandalous manner. See Juv. Sat. vi. verse. 292—300. Compare 1 Sam. xxv. 44, and 1 Cor. vii. 13.
natural temper and inclination is in this respect peculiar; and there are [some] eunuchs who were made eunuchs by the wickedness of men, who drive on that scandalous traffic which the luxury and effeminacy of the eastern world has rendered so common; and there are [some] eunuchs on account of the kingdom of heaven, that is, who, by a resolute guard on their appetites and passions, have conquered the propensities of nature, that being free from the incumbrances of marriage, and devoting themselves to a life of more sublime devotion, they might promote the interest of my gospel. (Compare 1 Cor. vii. 7, 37.) He therefore, on the whole, that finds he is able to receive [this saying] let him receive it! or let him that is in his own conscience persuaded that he can glorify God most by a single life, choose it. Others may, and ought to marry; but let none lightly rush into that state on a supposition that the bond of it may be broken through at pleasure.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. From what we have been reading we may justly take occasion to adore the wisdom and goodness of Divine Providence in creating the human species male and female, and providing for his new formed creature Adam so suitable and so amiable a companion, to enliven every other object of delight, and to crown the pleasures of paradise itself.

Let us also acknowledge the apparent interposition of a wise and kind providence in maintaining such a proportion between the sexes, even to this day, which so apparently tends to the benefit of both, as well as to the support of the race in future ages; as also in perpetuating in their hearts through succeeding generations that mutual tenderness for each other which the purest bosoms may feel and avow, and which is the foundation of such an union of souls as no other friendship will admit.

Let those who are married, considering the indissoluble bond by which God has joined them together, make it their constant care to promote the comfort and happiness of each other; and let them most cautiously guard against every degree of contention, or even of distaste, which might at length occasion an alienation in their affections, and render so close a bond proportionably grievous.

Let none rashly run into these important engagements, nor determine their choice by light considerations, of a low and transitory nature.
nature. And if any, on the whole, prefer the freedom of a single life to a state which, with its peculiar comforts, must necessarily have its peculiar cares and trials too, let them diligently improve that disengagement, as an obligation to seek the kingdom of God with greater ardour; and to pursue its interests with more active zeal and application.

To conclude; since it appears in this respect, as well as in some others, that the gospel revokes some indulgences which the law of 11, 12 Moses gave, let us endeavour to form our hearts by Divine grace to a wisdom, seriousness, and spirituality, which may suit this nobler dispensation; and while we are reading the precept of the Jewish legislator, let us remember we have a sublimier Master, and are to do and forbear more than others. (Mat. v. 47.)

SECT. CXXXVI.

Christ blesses the little children that were brought to him, and rebukes his disciples who would have forbid them. Mat. XIX. 13;

Mark X. 13.

AND they brought, [Luke, infants and] young children to him, that he should touch them [or put his hands on them, and pray;]
that brought them. [Mat. xix. 13.—Luke xviii. 15.

Mark X. 13.

AND while Jesus continued here, as the inha-atisants of the neighbouring country on the banks of Jordan found their esteem for him continually increasing on their acquaintance with him, (John x. 41, 42, p. 92,) they brought to him, not only the sick, that they might be healed, (Mat. xix. 2, p. 94,) but also several infants [and] other young children, who, though they could walk and speak, yet were not capable of understanding his doctrine, that he might touch them, [or] lay his hands upon them in a solemn manner and pray for them;2 not doub-ing but prayers so acceptable to God as his would prevail both for their present and future happiness. And when his disciples, and particularly the apostles, who were about him, saw it, they rebuked those that brought them, as apprehending them too troublesome, and thinking it beneath the dignity of so great a Prophet to concern himself about such little creatures, who were incapable of receiving any instruction from him.

But

2 Lay his hands upon them, and pray.] This was a rite that was very early used, particularly by those who stood in any superior relation, when they were praying for a blessing on young persons. See Gen. xlviii. 13—20.—I see no reason to think, with Elsner, that they were brought to Christ for the cure of some malady; for in that case it is not to be imagined that the disciples would have been so inhuman as to prohibit them.

But Jesus seeing it, was greatly displeased, and moved with some degree of indignation against his disciples; for he had a tender love to children, and well knew that a proper notice of these might turn to some valuable account; and therefore he said to them, Let the little children alone, and do not now, or at any other convenient time, hinder them from coming to me: I am pleased, rather than offended, to see them near me; for of such is the kingdom of God: persons of such a character are the true subjects of my kingdom, and heirs of eternal glory, to which many little children are received; and in token of it the children of believing parents are to be admitted into my church by a baptism.

15 And verily, I say unto you, as I have formerly told you, (Mat. xviii. 3, 4. sect. xciii.) and would now have you to attend with seriousness while I repeat it, _Whosoever shall not be willing to receive the kingdom of God, or the gospel dispensation, and the happiness it promises, as a little child, divesting himself of those prejudices and those secular views which men contract in their riper years, that he may come, as it were, to the humility and meekness, the simplicity and teachableness of a little child (compare Ps. cxxxii. 2) he shall not in any wise, or on any terms, enter into it, be his genius ever so sublime, or his circumstances in life ever so considerable._

16. And having said this, he would no longer be detained from shewing his regard unto these little

b Knew that a proper notice of these &c.) Christ's shewing his regard in such a manner to them not only must have been exceedingly pleasing to the parents; but the memory of this condescension might make tender and lasting impressions on the children themselves; and the sight must be very edifying and encouraging to other young persons who might happen to be present; not to say how instructive this gentleness to children may be to ministers, and how much their usefulness may, or might have been, promoted by a due regard to it. —Nicephorus tells us that the celebrated Ignatius, afterwards Bishop of Antioch, was one of these infants. —Our Lord might reasonably be the more displeased with his disciples for endeavouring to prevent their being brought, as he had so lately set a child among them; and insisted on the necessity of their being made conformable to it. Mat. xviii. 2, 3. sect. xciii. Vol. I. p. 487. —I am obliged to Dr. Scott's late Version of St. Matthew's Gospel, which, according to the manner of the learned and ingenious author, is exact to a wonder, for the alteration I have made here, and for some other changes, which I take this opportunity of acknowledging with due gratitude.

c For of such is the kingdom of God, &c.) I acknowledge these words will not of themselves prove infant baptism to be an institution of Christ; but if that appears from other scriptures to be the case (which I think most probable,) there will be proportionable reason to believe that our Lord might here intend some reference to it; and I cannot approve of rendering τάξιν, such as resemble these. It is the part of a faithful translator not to limit the sense of the original, nor to fix what it leaves ambiguous.
little children, but having called them to him, and ordered the infants to be brought, he took them up in his arms, tenderly embracing them with a holy complacency and love; and, as a further token of the overflowing kindness and benevolence of his heart towards them, he laid his hands upon them, and blessed them, recommending them in a solemn manner to the Divine blessing and favour; which accordingly descended upon them, to strengthen their constitutions, and to sanctify their hearts. And, after this, he departed from thence to another place in the neighbourhood, where the young ruler attended him, as will be presently related.

IMPROVEMENT.

Let us make a pause here, that we may more attentively review this delightful and instructive sight; that we may see this compassionate Shepherd of Israel, thus gathering the lambs in his arms and carrying them in his bosom with all the tokens of tender regard, (Isa. xl. 11.) rebuking his disciples who forbade their coming and laying his gracious hands upon them to bless them. How condescending and engaging a behaviour! how encouraging and amiable an image!

Let his ministers view it, to teach them a becoming regard to the lambs of their flock, who should early be taken notice of and instructed; and for and with whom they should frequently pray; remembering how often Divine grace takes possession of the heart in the years of infancy, and sanctifies the children of God almost from the womb. Let every first impression made upon their tender minds be cherished; and let not those whom Christ himself is ready to receive be disregarded by his servants, who upon all occasions should be gentle unto all, and apt to teach. (2 Tim. ii. 24.)

Let parents view this sight with pleasure and thankfulness: let it encourage them to bring their children to Christ by faith, and to commit them to him in baptism, and by prayer. And if he who has the keys of death and the unseen world, (Rev. i. 18.) see fit to remove those dear creatures from us in their early days, let the remembrance of this story comfort us, and teach us to hope that he who so graciously received these children has not forgotten ours, but that they are sweetly fallen asleep in him, and will be the everlasting objects of his care and love; for of such is the kingdom of God.

Redeemer did not despise these little ones; nay, he was much displeased with those who would have prevented their being brought to him. As kindly would he, no doubt, have received you, ye dear children, who read or hear this; as kindly will he still receive you, if you go to him in the sincerity of your hearts, and ask his blessing in humble and earnest prayer. Though you see not Christ, he sees and hears you; he is now present with you, to receive you, to bless you, and to save you. Happy the weakest of you when lodged in the arms of Christ! nothing can pluck you from thence, or ever hurt you there.

In a word, let us all commit ourselves to him; and let us be disposed to become as little children, if we desire to enter into his kingdom. Let us not govern ourselves by the vain maxims of a corrupt and degenerate age. Let not pride, ambition, lust, or avarice, possess, torment, and enslave our minds; but, with the amiable simplicity of children, let us put ourselves into the wise and kind hand of Jesus, as our Guardian, and refer ourselves to his pastoral and parental care, to be clothed and fed, to be guided and disposed of, as he shall see fit. For this purpose, O God, may we be born again by thy Spirit, and formed anew by thy grace! since by this method alone we can be made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, (Col. i. 12.) and be so the children of God, as to be at length the children of the resurrection.

SECT. CXXXVII.

A rich young man applying himself to Christ for direction in the way to eternal life, and afterwards parting with him out of regard to his possessions, gives our Lord an occasion of cautioning his disciples concerning the danger of riches. Mat. XIX. 16, to the end. Mark X. 17—31. Luke XVIII. 18—30.

AND as he went out from thence, into the way to some other place which he designed to visit, behold, a most remarkable occurrence happened; for there came one, even a certain magistrate, or ruler, who was a young person in very plentiful circumstances, running with an eager desire to converse with Jesus before he left that place; and he no sooner was come near him, a As he went out from thence.] Both Matthew and Luke relate this story of the young ruler immediately after that in the preceding section; but Mark is more determinate than either of them in the connection, and more circumstantial in the narration.

And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is God: [but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.] [Matt. xix. 17. Luke xviii. 19.]

19 [He saith unto him, Which? Jesus said,] Thou knowest the commandments, [Thou shalt do no murder; Thou shalt not commit adultery; Thou shalt not steal; Thou shalt not bear false witness;} De-him; and that which indeed stands in the front of all these, "Honour thy father and thy mother." These are the six last commandments, which I now recommend to thy consideration; and they may all be summed up in that one comprehensive precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." (See Exod. xx. 12—17. and Lev. xix. 18.)

20 And the young man, not apprehending the large extent and spiritual meaning of these precepts, replied, with great cheerfulness and confidence, and said to him, Master, I have been early taught these precepts, and may venture to say that I have conscientiously observed all these even from my infancy, and have abstained from each of the vices and immoralities condemned in them: what then do I farther need, in order to secure the glorious prize after which I am seeking?

21 And Jesus, looking steadfastly upon him, loved him, and felt the emotions of complacency mingled with tender compassion, in regard to so young a person, who had maintained so honourable a character in such an elevated station of life, and was under such concern about another world; yet at the same time, amidst all these hopeful circumstances, was governed still by a secret fondness for the possessions he enjoyed in this: and as our Lord thought fit to manifest this fondness to himself and others, when he had heard these things which have been mentioned above, he was pleased to call him forth to a peculiar trial; and therefore said unto him, Thus far

20 And [the young man] answered and said unto him, Master, all these things have I observed from my youth: [What lack I yet?] [Mat. xix. 20. Luke xviii. 21.]

21 Then Jesus beholding him, loved him, and [Luke, when he heard these things, he] said unto him, [Luke,]

\[\text{\textit{a Thou shalt not defraud.}}\] As Mark seems to put this for the tenth commandment, Dr. Hammond, (in loc.) and Archbishop Tillotson (see his Works, Vol. II. p. 257) suppose it a key to the sense of those words, Thou shalt not covet; the meaning of which, they argue, is as if it had been said, "Thou shalt not be so desirous of thy neighbour's possessions as to be willing to injure the owner by depriving him of them, that thou mayest secure them to thyself." But the apostle Paul strongly intimates that the sense of that command is much more extensive (Rom. vii. 7.) and as the preceding commandments had forbid to invade the life, the bed, the property, or reputation of another, so this requires a guard on those irregular appetites and passions which might by insensible degrees lead men to murder, adultery, theft, or false witness.

\[\text{\textit{b I have observed all these, even from my infancy.}}\] The phrase \textit{even from my youth} has been very exactly rendered from my infancy: but as he was yet but a young man, it is probably here put for infancy or childhood. It is plain he did not understand the spiritual meaning and extent of the law according to our Lord's explication of it in his sermon on the mount, or he would not have pleaded his exact obedience to it. But the Jews in general seem to have thought that, if they abstained from gross crimes, sacrifices might atone for smaller neglects or offences. And this compound seems to have been that righteousness of their own in which, to their final ruin, they trusted for justification before God, in the neglect of the righteousness which is of God by faith. Compare Rom. x. 3. and Phil. iii. 9.
Being called to sell all he had, he goes away sorrowful.

[Luke, yet] one thing thou lackest: [if thou wilt be perfect,] go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor; and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, take up the cross, and follow me. [Matt. xix. 21. Luke xviii. 22.]

22 [But when the young man heard that saying,] he was sad, and went away [Luke, very sorrowful;] for he [Luke, was very rich, and] had great possessions. [Matt. xix. 22. Luke xviii. 23.]

And [Luke, when Jesus saw that he was very sorrowful,] he looked round about, and saith to his disciples, How hardly shall they far it is well; but yet, alas, One thing thou still wantest, in order to prove that integrity of soul and that prevailing love to God, without which none can be entitled to future blessedness: by me he now commands thee, if thou wilt be perfect, and determine to submit to all that he requires, to go thy way immediately, and sell all thy possessions, valuable as they are, and to distribute the money which arises from the sale of them to the poor; do this, and thou shalt have an infinitely more excellent treasure in heaven; and, in the assured hope of this, I call thee to come and take up the cross, and with courage and resolution to follow me as my constant attendant, though it should be even at the expense of thy life as well as thine estate.

But when the young man heard that saying, and saw that all his gay and delightful prospects for life must be given up in a moment, he was exceedingly concerned and troubled at it: and he went away in great sorrow; for he was very rich, and had great possessions, which were lately fallen into his hands; and how desirous soever he was of eternal life, he could not resolve to secure it at so great an expense.

And when Jesus saw that though he was very sorrowful, yet he chose rather to go away than to part with his estate in the views of eternal happiness, he looked round on all that were about him and said to his disciples, Observe this instructive incident, and learn to make this reflection upon it; How hardly shall they that possess

One thing thou wantest.] Our Lord does not say he wanted but one thing; so that nothing can be concluded from hence against the necessity of an acquaintance with some truths, of which this youth, hopeful and amiable as he was, appears to have been ignorant. But it was to be charged on that want of sincere piety which his conduct presently discovered, that he did not come to the knowledge of them by a continued and submissive attendance on the teaching of Christ. See John viii. 17. sect. xcviii.

Sell all thy possessions.] It is strange that the learned and accurate Dr. Clarke should suppose that Christ did not demand this, in order to his being in a state of acceptance with God, but in order to his giving a testimony of exalted piety; or at least, as necessary at that time to his being a preacher of the gospel. Our Lord's manner of proposing the trial, and his reflection on the young man's going away, plainly shew that it was in those circumstances necessary to his salvation. And indeed it is most apparent, that though God does not in fact require every man to distribute all his goods to others, and so in effect to become one of the number of poor to be relieved out of his own possessions, yet sincere virtue and piety demand an habitual readiness, not only to sacrifice our possessions, but our lives, at the command of God; and Providence does in fact call some out to trials as severe as this. His refusal plainly showed he valued his worldly possessions more than eternal life; and our Lord, with great wisdom, took this direct and convincing method of manifesting both to himself and others, that secret insincerity and carnality of temper which prevailed under all these specious pretences and promising appearances. [Easier] possess the riches of this world enter into the kingdom of God! Dwell upon the thought, and repeat it, in order, if possible, to wean your hearts from these delusive vanities which often prove so fatal to the soul: for verily I say unto you, So many snares attend such circumstances, that a rich man will hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven, or be brought to such a relish for the gospel, and its future blessings, as either to resign, or improve his worldly possessions, in such a manner as the laws of that kingdom require.

And the disciples were quite astonished at his words; for they were ready to imagine that ere long, all the rich and great people of the country would appear for their Lord, and fix him on the throne of Israel.

But Jesus, answering again to that surprise which he saw in their countenances, says to them in the most condescending manner, My dear children, when you consider what I said more attentively, you will not so much wonder at it: for it is manifest that the generality of rich men place their chief confidence and delight in the things of this present world; and you know that true religion requires a heart abstracted from them, and placed on nobler objects: judge then for yourselves, how hard is it for them that thus trust in their riches, to enter into the kingdom of God! And therefore I say to you again in yet stronger terms, that your common proverb may have its place here, That it is easier for the huge cable of a ship, or even for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than it is, for a rich man to conquer the snares of his estate and the corruptions of his heart so far as to enter into the kingdom of God, and become the faithful, obedient subject of his Son.

And when his disciples heard [this] repetition and illustration of what was before said, they were struck into exceeding great and inexpressible amazement. They that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! [Verily I say unto you, that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.] [Mat. xix. 23. Luke xvii. 24.]

24 And the disciples were astonished at his words.

—But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!

25 [And again I say unto you.] It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

26 And when his disciples heard [this] they were exceedingly amazed, and astonished.

b Easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle.
	n Ecumen. read καλός ἁμορράς, which they explain of a cable rope, which might appear more fitly to be mentioned as what could not pass through a needle’s eye.

Others very precariously assert that there was near Jerusalem a low gate called the needle’s eye, through which a camel could not pass unless his load were taken off.

But I see no reason for departing from the received reading and interpretation; nor is there any thing in this proverbial expression, as it here stands, but what is very agreeable to the eastern taste, and may be paralleled in other Jewish writers. See Dr. Lightfoot’s Hor. Hebr. on Mat. xix. 24. where it is shewn there was a Jewish proverb to the same purpose of the elephant.

What is impossible with men is possible with God.

nished out of measure, saying among themselves, Who then can be saved? [Mat. xix. 25. Luke xviii. 26.]

27 And Jesus looking upon them, saith unto them, With men [this] is impossible, but not with God: for with God all things are possible, [Luke, even the things which are impossible with men.] [Mat. xix. 26. Luke xviii. 27.]

28 Then Peter answered, and began to say unto him, Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee! [What shall we have therefore?] [Mat. xix. 27. Luke xviii. 28.]

MAT. XIX. 28. And Jesus answered, and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall be amazement at it, saying one to another, And who then can be saved? Who that are rich can ever get to heaven? And what a discouragement will it be to others to see the rich and the great neglecting salvation, and turning the means of their happiness and usefulness into the instruments of their destruction?

But Jesus, looking steadfastly upon them, saith unto them, With men it is indeed impossible, and the strength of corrupt nature alone will not be sufficient to encounter such difficulties as these; but it is not impossible with God to animate their hearts against them: for his grace has an almighty energy, and with God all things are possible [even] the things which are most impossible with men, and seem so insurmountable to human strength as to be reckoned utterly impracticable; to him therefore let the rich and poor unite their supplications, that each may be rendered superior to the snares which attend their respective circumstances.

Then Peter replied, and with some warmth and confidence began to say unto him, Well, Master, behold, we have done, what this youth, hopeful as he seemed, had not the resolution to do; for though indeed we had not much, we have left the little that we had in the world, and have at all adventures followed thee with the sincerest zeal and affection: What reward shall we therefore have? For we persuade ourselves, thou wilt not permit us finally to be losers in thy cause.

And Jesus answering said to them, You may depend upon it, that you shall not, but will be found, upon the whole, to have acted the wisest part; for verily I say unto you, and assure you of it, that you who have followed me in my humiliation, shall at length be distinguished by proportionable honours: And in the great renovation of all things, when all the children of God shall, as it were, be born anew from their

1 In the great renovation of all things.] I have given what appears to me the most natural sense of this difficult passage. Mr. Fleming agrees with our translators in connecting the words αναθεσις with the preceding clause; and paraphrases the verse thus, "As for you, my apostles, who have followed me in this new state of the church, which is to be brought to the birth, when I am to ascend to heaven; that I may govern the world from thence by my word and Spirit, ye shall be to the whole Christian church, what the twelve heads of the tribes were of old to the Jewish nation: my followers shall appeal to your decisions, as the rule of their faith and practice." (Fleming's Chris ology, Vol. I. p. 28.) But it seems plain to me that our Lord refers in the following words to the time of final retribution, which he elsewhere
They that leave all for Christ shall be great gainers.

Mark x. 29. [And] there is no man, that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, [Luke, for the kingdom of God's sake; that is,] for my name's sake, and the gospel's. [Mat. xix. 29. Luke xviii. 29.]

30 But he shall receive [Luke, manifold more, yea] an hundred-fold now in this [Luke, present] time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children and lands; such shall be the delights of a good conscience, and the secret manifestations of Divine acceptance and favour, which shall mingle themselves with all the persecutions he shall here endure; and when where mentions as that in which he should sit on the throne of his glory. Mat. xxv. 31, 32.—Mr. Pierce (on Heb. i. 5. follows Brennus in expounding the regeneration of the time when Christ should be (as it were) begotten again by his resurrection from the dead; but the criticism seems very unnatural, and the objection mentioned above lies against it in its full force.——The laboured argument which Dr. Thomas Burnet deduces from hence, to prove the re-novation of the earth at the millennium, is very precarious; since the words will so fairly admit of another sense, referring them to the general resurrection. See Burnet's Theory, Vol. II. p. 229, 230.

* Shall sit upon twelve thrones.* Our Lord well knew that Judas would fall from his office and dignity; but as Matthias filled his place, and so stood intitled to the promise, he did not think it fit to enter into any particular distinction; but speaks to the whole body of the apostles in words which he knew would be accomplished to the far greater part of those to whom they were addressed.

1 Shall receive—an hundred-fold now in this present time—with persecutions. Dr. Massey, in his Vernacula Sacra, p. 18, proposes a very different version of this period, viz. "Though he may not receive [as I may live] an hundred-fold (or a sufficient recompence) world to come shall inherit eternal life. — [Mat. xix. 29. Luke xviii. 30.]

But many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first. [Mat. xix. 30.]

31 But many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first.
under the gospel, that many [who are] first in the advantages and privileges they enjoy, shall notwithstanding this fall short of others, and be last in the great day of accounts; and those who are the last shall prove in this respect to be the first: For some, from whom it might be least expected, shall embrace the gospel, and courageously endure the greatest hardships for it; while others, with far greater advantages, shall reject it, and under much stronger engagements shall desert it.

IMPROVEMENT:

Who can behold, without weeping eyes, and a bleeding heart, this lovely youth perishing in sin! What could have appeared more promising, than this solicitous concern about eternal life, in a young man, rich in the possessions, and high in the honours of the present world! To see him running with such eagerness to the feet of a Redeemer, kneeling down, with such humility before him, calling upon him by so honourable a title, and professing so sincere a desire of instruction, could not but lead us to conclude, Surely this man was not far from the kingdom of God; nor do we wonder, that Jesus beholding him loved him. Who would not have looked on such an object with complacency! Who would not have expected, that this pleasant plant should have brought forth grapes; but behold, it brought forth wild grapes! (Isa. v. 2.) So have we seen, in the compass, perhaps, of our small observation and experience, many a fair blossom fall withering to the ground. So have recompense now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands; yet after persecution, [μὴ διώχεται] and in the world to come, he shall receive eternal life. But I neither think the authority of Theophylact sufficient to warrant our substituting διώχεται for διώχεται; nor can I find any satisfactory example of such an ellipsis as this version supposes in the original, if that variation were allowed; to which we may add, that the parallel passages both in Mat. and Luke lie strongly against the version proposed.

m Lovely youth perishing in sin.] Dr. Watts's excellent Sermon on this subject, and with this title, will, I doubt not, be recollected by multitudes on this occasion. There is so much beauty and pathos, so much wisdom and piety in it, that I could wish it might be attentively perused, especially by every one of my younger readers; for I would hope there are few capable of reading it without some serious impressions.
have the hopes of ministers, and parents, and other religious friends, been disappointed, with respect to many young persons, adorned with a variety of amiable qualifications, yet lacking one thing, and parting with Christ when put to the trial, after all the regard they have shewn to his name, and all the pleasing expectations they have given of a willingness to serve him. O my young Reader, whoever thou art, I earnestly pray, that thou mayest not be added to that number!

19, 20 This unhappy youth imagined himself in the certain way of salvation, because he was free from the stains of fraud and injustice, of adultery and theft, of perjury and murder, or any other gross and infamous sin. But behold, how awful a method Christ takes, to open to him that insincerity of heart, which he seems himself not to have known. Observe, how strange a command he gives him, to sell all, and distribute to the poor. We cannot say, that the very same is directly required of us; yet by this order that was given to him, we are obliged to part with our all, when it cannot be preserved with a good conscience; and by the general rules of Christianity, and its fundamental precepts, we are in duty bound, conscientiously to use, not only a little part of our substance, but even the whole of it for God, as stewards who are another day to give up a strict account for all. And if we like not Christ and glory on these terms, our end will be no better than his. Of him we read, that after all his morality, and all his zeal he went away from Christ, (though sorrowful,) because he had great possessions. Oh dear-bought wealth, which was the price of his soul!

Let us look upon him, and receive instruction; let us learn to be upon our guard against this vain world, that specious harlot, who hath cast down many wounded: yea, many strong men have been slain by her; (Prov. vii. 26.) How universally are riches desired, how eagerly are they pursued, by persons in all stations and of all professions of life! Yet what do they generally prove but shining mischief and gilded ruin! If we believe the incarnate wisdom of God, they make our salvation exceeding hazardous. Yet who does not wish for them? Who does not think that he has wisdom and grace enough to stand the danger? But God knows otherwise, and therefore he keeps, or makes, so many of his children poor.—Let them be contented with their safer state; and let those who are rich be importunate with God for those influences of his grace which can effect those things that are impossible with men.

On the whole, let us not think much of any thing which Christ demands, knowing that whatever we may lose, or whatever we may resign, we shall gain far more by his favour. The testimony of of a good conscience before him, a life of friendship with God, the consolations of his Spirit, and the hopes of his glory, will yield, even for the present, an hundred-fold more satisfaction than the Ver. possessions of the greatest riches, or the enjoyment of the most tender and beloved relatives. How much more abundantly then will all be repaid in the heavenly state! And, if we cannot trust the promise of our Lord for it, we are no more real Christians than if we were publicly to worship mammon, or Plutus, with all the idolatrous rites of the ancient heathens.

Sect. CXXXVIII.

Christ, by the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, warns the Jews against envying the Gentiles those equal privileges to which they should be called in the Messiah's kingdom. Mat. XX. 1—16.

Mat. XX. 1.

In order to illustrate the observation which our Lord had just been making, "that many who were first should be last, and many last should be first," he added the following parable, and said, This will be found to be the case in many instances; for the kingdom of heaven, or the gospel-dispensation, is like, or may be fitly represented by the similitude of a man that was the master of a family, who went out early in the morning to hire labourers for his vineyard, at the time when the vintage was to be gathered in. And having agreed with the labourers for the usual price of a denarius, or Roman penny, a day, he sent them into his vineyard, to be employed there in his service.

And going out again about the third hour, and

2 And when he had agreed with the labourers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard.
3 And he went out about the third hour, and a Is like, or may be fitly represented by the similitude of a man.] See note i on Luke vii. 52, Vol. I. p. 307.—Those who are acquainted with the eastern manners know that this parable is exactly suited to them in a variety of circumstances, which many learned commentators have observed, but which it does not seem necessary to enumerate here. See Petav. Dogmat Theolog. Vol. I. p. 305, & seq.

b A denarius, a Roman penny, a day.] It seems from hence that this (which was in value about seven-pence halfpenny of our money) was the usual price of a day's service among the Jews; as Tacitus tells us it was among the Romans. (Annal. i. 17.) It is therefore justly mentioned, Rev. vi. 6, as a proof of the great scarcity of provisions, when a measure or chazon of wheat, which was the usual allowance to one man for a day, and was about an English quart, was sold at that price.

2 About the third hour.] Dr. Whitby in his Paraphrase explains the first call in the morning, of the earliest days of Christ's preaching; that of the third hour, as referring to the mission of the apostles when they were first sent forth to preach among the Jews; those of the sixth and ninth hours, of their preaching the gospel, after the descent of the Holy Ghost, to the Jews in Judea, and then to the dispersed in other parts; and that of the eleventh hour, of the calling of the Gentiles: but this seems an excessive nicety of distinction.—The Jews were ready to look upon themselves with complacency,
The labourers are hired at different hours.

(or at nine in the morning) he saw others standing unemployed in the market, where it was customary for servants to stand, in order to their being hired. And he said to them, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is the reasonable value of your labour, I will be sure to give you. And they went away to their work without any more particular agreement.

5 And again going out about the sixth and ninth hour (or at noon, and at three in the afternoon) he did the same, and sent others to work on the same general promise of giving them as much, as they could reasonably expect.

6 And once more about the eleventh hour, (or at five in the afternoon) going out of his house, he returned to the market, and found others standing unemployed: and he says to them, Why do ye stand here and do nothing? Do you choose thus to trifle away your time, and continue the whole day unemployed? They say unto him, No; but we continue here, because no one has hired us to any kind of labour. Then he says to them, Go ye also into the vineyard, where you may be employed, and whatsoever is fit and reasonable to be given for your labour, you shall receive.

8 Now when evening was come (or at six o'clock), the time when workmen were paid off, and sent home, the lord of the vineyard says to his steward, Call the labourers who have been working in the vineyard, and pay them their wages, beginning from those who were the last hired, and so going on even to the first.

And having thus been ordered to present themselves, when they accordingly came foremost who were hired about the eleventh hour, and so had entered last into the vineyard, they each of them received no less than a penny, the master having directed they should be thus generously rewarded.

4 And said unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right, I will give you. And they went their way.

5 Again he went out about the sixth and ninth hour, and did likewise.

6 And about the eleventh hour he went out, and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle?

7 They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive.

8 So when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward, Call the labourers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first.

9 And when they came that were hired, about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny; complacency, as a people who had for many ages adhered to the worship of the true God, and in some periods had endured great extremities out of a regard to it; and it seems natural to interpret what is said, (ver. 12.) of bearing the burden and heat of the day, with a reference to this, rather than to any peculiar hardship which the earlier converts among the Jews might have endured more than the believing Gentiles, many of whom met with much the same treatment on their embracing Christianity. See 1 Thess. ii. 14.

\footnote{\textit{Whatever is reasonable.} So I think the word \\textit{reasonable} may be rendered, Phil. i. 7. Col. iv. 1. and 2 Pet. i. 15. and that it signifies not only what a person may legally claim, but what he might equitably expect from a person of honour, and humanity.}
The first murmure that the last receive as much as they.

10 But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more: and they likewise received every man a penny.

11 And when they had received it, they murmured against the good man of the house, 12 Saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day.

13 But he answered one of them, and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny?

14 Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last, even as unto thee.

15 Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil because I am good?

And upon seeing this, when those who were the first, and had been working all the day, came to be paid, they reckoned with themselves that they should have received considerably more; but they were also paid the same, and only received every one a penny. And when they had received [it,] instead of being satisfied with what was promised them, they murmured against the master of the house who had set them to work, and said, Truly these last have laboured but one hour, and thou hast made them equal in the recompence they have received to us, who have borne the whole burden, and gone through all the toil and heat of the day from morning to night.

But he calmly answered and said to one of them, who spoke in the name of the rest, Friend, it is most apparent that I do not in any degree injure thee, or any of thy companions: didst not thou agree with me to labour all the day for a penny, and hast thou not received it? Take what is justly thine, and be gone, without pretending to dictate to me in an affair wherein thou hast no manner of concern; for I will do as I see fit, and give to this last man, who came in but an hour ago, even as I do to thee. And indeed what colour hast thou for a complaint? Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with what is undoubtedly mine own property? What if I pleased to give it to one who had done nothing at all for it? Is thine eye evil, or dost thou look [\footnote{They murmured against the master of the house.] That this was the case of the Jews, upon a general notion of the Gentiles being, according to the Christian scheme, intended to be partakers with them in the same church-privileges, is plain from a variety of scriptures. See Acts xi. 2, 3, xiii. 45—50. xvii. 5. 12. xviii. 6. 13. xii. 21. 22. xxviii. 29. Rom. xi. 28. and 1 Thess. ii. 16.

[\footnote{I will give to this last even as to thee.] Since no murmuring can happen among the blessed, this must refer to the unbelieving Jews; but as it is certain they will have no place in the kingdom of heaven, we plainly see that it would be very absurd to pretend to draw doctrinal consequences from every incidental circumstance of a parable.

[\footnote{And indeed is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?] That the particle may thus be rendered, And indeed, has been observed before, note on Mat. vii. 9. Vol. i. p. 258.—And as to what is here suggested, so many scriptures declare expressly that God at the great day will render to every one according to his works, and intimate that there shall be an exact correspondence between every man’s character and the reward which (through the riches of Divine grace) shall then be bestowed, that it would be very unreasonable, from such a circumstance as this in the parable, to infer the contrary. But if any should maintain that all the favours of Divine Providence and grace must now be dispensed only in proportion to the wisdom and goodness of the person concerned, I apprehend they would argue directly contrary to the whole design of this parable, and to what daily appears to be fact, which therefore cannot give way to any hypothesis.

on with an envious and malignant countenance, because I am so good, that out of compassion to these poor men I freely give them what they could not justly have claimed?

And thus said Jesus at the conclusion of this parable, You see (as I have just been telling you, Mat. xix. 30) there are some who seemed to be the last in privileges and advantages, who shall be first in the reward and happiness that shall be given to them; and, on the other hand, there are many in those respects the first, who shall be last. And this is a remark peculiarly applicable to the Jewish nation, who will murmur at the calling of the Gentiles to equal dignities and privileges with themselves, and on that account will reject the gospel, and persecute you the preachers of it: for though many are called, and the messages of salvation are sent to vast multitudes, even to all the thousands of Israel, yet there are but few chosen: a small remnant only will embrace the gospel so universally offered, and so be saved according to the election of grace, (Rom. xi. 5) while the rest will be justly disowned by God, as a punishment for so obstinate and so envious a temper.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. 16 May we by Divine grace appear in the happy number of those who are not only called, but chosen too! If we are first in privileges and opportunities, let us be careful that our improvement be proportionable; otherwise we shall be last, and see ourselves another day exceeded, and perhaps condemned, by those who stood in a rank much below us.

We are called to a course of holy labour, even to work in our Lord's vineyard, or in every station, whether public or private, to

1 Peculiarly applicable to the Jewish nation.] The remark itself is far more extensive, as I intimate both in the paraphrase and improvement. But as this was a memorable instance of it, so it is plainly what Christ had immediately in his view.

2 Many are called, but few chosen.] Grotius has a very learned and ingenious note on this text; but no genius or learning can be sufficient to prove what he seems to intend, that persons are called the chosen of God, merely with respect to the Divine complacency in them on account of some distinguished virtue and excellence. Compare Deut. vii. 6—8. ix. 6. John xv. 16.
to do our utmost to promote the glory of God and the happiness of mankind. Let us not, with so many calls and so many advantages, stand all the day idle; but let us be active and patient, and cheerfully willing to bear all the burden and heat of the day in so good a cause; knowing that ere long the evening will come, and that he who employs us saith, Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be. (Rev. xxii. 12.)

Let such as have long neglected the great business of life be encouraged with this thought, that some were called at the eleventh hour: but let none presume on their having such a call nor strain the parable so far as to imagine that an equal reward awaits all, without any regard to their characters or improvements; which is most contrary to the reason of things, to the word of God, and to the great intent of that day which is to render to every man according to his deeds. (Rom. ii. 6.)

The Gentiles are indeed now called to equal privileges with the Jews, to which this circumstance of the parable refers: and we all see how odious a temper it was in that favourite nation to be offended with the gospel on that account, which should rather have recommended it to their more joyful acceptance. Let us be careful to avoid every degree of envy, whoever may be put on a level with us, or preferred to us. Let us acknowledge the sovereign right of God to do what he will with his own, and let not our eye be evil, because he is good. To prevent this, let us labour after that unfeigned love to the brethren which never will allow us to repine at their advancement to the greatest privileges, but will engage us to behold the favours that are shewn them with delight and satisfaction, and to rejoice in their honour and happiness as our own. So shall we exchange the basest and most uneasy passion of human nature for that which is of all others the noblest and the most delightful.

SECT. CXXIX.

Our Lord, hearing of the sickness of his friend Lazarus, and afterwards knowing that he was dead, determines to go from the country beyond Jordan to Judea, though against the persuasion of his disciples. John XI. 1.

John XI. 1. Now a certain man was sick, named Lazarus of Bethany, the John XI. 1. Now while Jesus was on the other side Jordan, whither he had retired when he left Jerusalem (John x. 40, sect. cxxxiv.), there was one

The Sisters send to inform Jesus of it.

1. Lazarus of Bethany, which was also the town of Mary, and Martha her sister, who was sick of a very dangerous distemper. And, by the way, it is to be observed, that it was [that] Mary who afterwards at a public entertainment, in testimony of her high regard and veneration for him, anointed the Lord with a most precious ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair,

3. whose brother Lazarus was sick. The sisters therefore, full of concern for their diseased brother, knowing where Jesus was, sent to him, and said, Lord, we beg that thou wouldst be pleased to favour us with a visit, whatever difficulties may lie in the way; for behold him whom thou so tenderly lovest, even Lazarus thy friend, is so exceedingly ill, that, without thy interposition for his deliverance, nothing but death can be expected.

4. But when Jesus heard [it], he said, This sickness is not designed by providence to end in his death; and final removal out of this world; but shall serve for the remarkable illustration of the glory of God, and is suffered to prevail, chiefly with a design that the Son of God may be glorified by it, and his Divine mission most signally confirmed.

5. Now it was well known that Jesus loved Martha, and her sister Mary, and this their brother Lazarus, with a peculiar affection, and had often visited them, and lodged at their house; and in consequence of this, he was determined to order the town of Mary and her sister Martha.

2. (It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick.)

3. Therefore his sisters sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick.

4. When Jesus heard that, he said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby.

5. Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus.

It was that Mary who anointed the Lord with ointment.] Some commentators have supposed that this refers to the story related by Luke, chap. vii. 37, & seq. (sect. li.) and have argued from thence that Mary Magdalen, whom they think to be the person there described as a woman that was a sinner, was the same with this Mary the sister of Lazarus. But it seems much more probable that John himself should mention the fact that he has here referred to; which, if he has done to all, it must be that which he relates, John xii. 3. & seq. (sect. cxlv.) where there can be no doubt but that the person who performed this instance of respect to Christ was Mary the sister of Lazarus, who was of Bethany near Jerusalem, and therefore must be different from Mary Magdalen, who was of Magdala, a town of Galilee at a considerable distance. Nor is there any ground from scripture to conclude that Mary Magdalen was the person who anointed Christ in Luke, which appears rather to be there described as the action of a woman of Nain, where Christ restored the widow's son to life (Luke vii. 17). Compare note b on Luke viii. 2. Vol. I. p. 319. Besides, the stories are related with such different circumstances, that it is strange they should be taken for the same fact; and as Luke no where tells us that the person he speaks of was named Mary, so neither have we any reason to suppose that the same person should anoint him twice.

b This sickness is not to death, &c. [Compare Mat. ix. 24, and Mark v. 39, Vol. I. p. 381.—Our Lord afterwards so fully explains what he meant by this ambiguous speech, that nothing reasonable can be objected to its; but it is a remarkable instance of the candour and fidelity of the evangelist here, and in the fore-cited places, so exactly to record the very words of Jesus, though malice might so easily cavil at them.

After
order the affair in such a manner as he knew would be most for their final advantage, though it might for a while be an occasion of greater affliction.

When therefore he had heard that he was sick, he then, without declaring he had any thought of going to him, abode yet two days longer on the other side Jordan, in the same place where he was before. And then after that, that is, on the third day, he says to his disciples, Let us now go back again to Judea.

The disciples say unto him, Rabbi, it is but just now that the Jews sought to stone thee (John x. 31, sect. cxxxiv.) and dost thou intend so soon to go thither again, as if it were to tempt the danger from which thou hast so lately with such difficulty escaped?

Jesus answered, Are there not twelve hours in the day? Now if any man take the advantage of them, and walk in the day, he is prepared for all events, and does not stumble at any obstacle which may lie in his way; because the sun is then above the horizon, and he sees the light of this world. But if any man will rather choose to walk in the night, it is no wonder at all if he stumbles then, because there is no light in the air around him. In like manner I am desirous, as I lately told you, to do the will of my heavenly Father while the day or opportunity of life lasts (John ix. 4, sect. cxxx.), and I doubt not but I shall thereby approve myself in his sight, and secure his protection and favour.

These things he said to silence their objections and to prepare their minds for what he yet concealed: and after this, as he perfectly knew what had passed at Bethany, though so many miles distant from it, he says to them, Our friend Lazarus is fallen asleep; but I am going to him that I may awake him; thereby referring to his death, and to that raising him from it which he intended quickly to effect.

After that he says to his disciples, &c.] From comparing Mat. xx. 17; Mark x. 32; and Luke xvii. 31 (sect. exlili.) many critics infer, that what is recorded there and in the following verses happened during the interval of Christ's delay to go to Bethany, after he heard that Lazarus was sick: but I do not find that Christ went to Jerusalem now; and if he did, it seems that those events happened in his very last journey thither, and consequently should not be introduced here; especially as they break the thread of the story, out of regard to which, I think, some small transpositions may well be allowed in other places though none be needful here.

Reflections on the sickness and death of Lazarus.

His disciples therefore, not apprehending his meaning, immediately said, Lord, if he sleeps naturally and quietly, as thou seemest to inti- mate, he will recover; and there is the less reason for thy running the hazard of going thither to heal him.

13 But Jesus spake this concerning his death, which for many apparent reasons he chose to represent under this gentle image; but they thought that he had spoken of his taking rest as a living man does in a common sleep.

14 Then Jesus therefore, that he might not hold them any longer in suspense, or leave them under a mistake, said to them plainly, Lazarus is indeed dead. And, as I could not have permitted this to have happened in my presence, I am glad on your account that I was not there; that you may more confidently believe in me, and may find your faith confirmed by a farther remarkable display of my Divine power, in some respects exceeding anything you have yet seen, but let us now go directly to him at Bethany.

15 Then Thomas, who was also called Didymus, said to his fellow-disciples and brethren in the apostolic office, Since our dear Master will expose himself to so much danger among his inhuman enemies in Judea, let us also go, though it be only that we may die with him; for whatsoever he may suffer, it is infinitely better we should take our portion with him, even in death, than that we should desert such a friend in an article of the extremest danger.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. How happy was this family of Lazarus in which Christ was so frequent a guest! how happy Lazarus and his sisters, who were so peculiarly beloved by him! Yet sickness and death invaded that pulchre, and to command him back to life again; but, avoiding all parade and ostentation, he chooses the simplest and humblest expression that can be thought of. This fine remark (which Mr. Blackwall makes in his Sacred Classics, Vol. I. p. 297) is admirably illustrated, in a great variety of particulars in the present story, by the ingenious Dr. Lardner in his Vindication of it. He has treated the subject with a caudourd and rectitude of heart equal to the accuracy of his critical skill, and even equal to that malignity and baseness of soul with which Woolston attacked it.

12 Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well.

13 Howbeit, Jesus spake of his death: but they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep.

14 Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead.

15 And I am glad for your sakes, that I was not there (to the intent ye may believe); nevertheless let us go unto him.

16 Then said Thomas, which is called Didymus, unto his fellow-disciples, Let us also go, that we may die with him.
that family; and this excellent man, as it should seem, in flourishing circumstances (ver. 19,) and perhaps too in early youth, was snatched away, on a sudden, by what appeared a very untimely stroke. The friends of Christ must be sick, and die, as well as others; and no man knoweth either love, or hatred, by all that is before them under the sun; (Eccles. ix. 1.) Let us therefore judge nothing before the time; (1 Cor. iv. 5.) This sickness and death of Lazarus was for the glory of God: and may all our personal and domestic sufferings be so! "To this, O Lord, may our life be consecrated, and to this may our death be subservient! We shall not then feel our dying pangs in half their bitterness, when our hearts are inflamed with a zeal for thy glory, and when we see that even those pangs are promoting it."

Our Lord delayed his coming to this dear friend in his extremity; and perhaps it occasioned, not only many an anxious, but many a suspicious thought, both to Lazarus and his sisters; yet the intent of this delay was both gracious and important. Let us not limit our Divine Master as to the time or manner of his appearance for us: let us not censure him if it be for a while put off. It is to exercise our faith and patience, and to make the mercy more signal and more welcome.

At length a resolution is formed to go into Judea; though but a little while ago the Jews had assaulted him, even in a sacred place, with burning malice in their hearts, and the instruments of death in their hands. But when Providence called, none of these things could move our blessed Redeemer, neither counted he his life dear unto him, that he might finish his course with joy. (Acts xx. 24.) May we shew the like intrepidity of soul in his service! walking in the day, that we may not stumble, and taking all proper opportunities of performing the duties of life while the season of it lasts; and then, when the night of death comes, it will close our eyes in peaceful slumbers. The repose of the breathless corpse, insensible of alarms, and sorrows, and cares, will be a lovely emblem of the sweeter repose of the soul in the arms of Divine love, till ere long Christ shall come to awaken us out of our sleep by that general resurrection of which this of Lazarus was a figure and pledge.

Let these glorious thoughts and expectations animate us to all the returns of affection, duty, and zeal. Let them teach us the temper of Thomas when he said, Let us go and die with him. "Blessed Jesus! how much better is it to die with and for thee, who art the resurrection and the life, than to prolong these wretched days of absence, meanness, and affliction, by forsaking thee when thou art leading us into danger!"
SECT. CXL.

Our Lord raises Lazarus from the dead after he had been buried four days. John XI. 17—46.

THEN Jesus, according to the resolution he had declared to his disciples (ver. 7, 15,) departed from the country beyond Jordan, where he had continued for some time, and went towards Bethany; and when he came near the village, he found that his friend Lazarus was dead, and that he had been now four days in the tomb.

18 Now Bethany, the place where Lazarus had lived, was very near to Jerusalem, being but about fifteen furlongs off (or somewhat less than two miles;) so that he was well known in the city, and had many friends there. And many of the Jews who dwelt there, when the funeral was over, came to Martha and Mary, that they might comfort them concerning the loss of their beloved brother.

20 And Jesus was no sooner come into the neighbourhood, but presently the news of his approach was brought to the afflicted family that had so long been impatiently desirous to see him. Martha therefore, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, immediately went out to meet him; but Mary, who was mourning with her friends in private, was not as yet informed of his approach, and [still] sat weeping in the house.

21 Then Martha, being told where she might meet with him, and having hastened to the place, said unto Jesus, Lord, we have been much surprised at thy delay, and cannot but exceedingly wonder why Jesus delayed his coming till the fourth day, that he might meet a great number of them, as, for wise purposes he determined to make this miracle very public.

2 Many of the Jews, &c. It might be one reason why Jesus delayed his coming, that he might meet a great number of them, as, for wise purposes he determined to make this miracle very public.

B Came to Martha and Mary.] The original has it προερχόμενος, but the learned Revis, in his Notes on Valhia on this text, has produced incontestable authorities to vindicate our version here, and to shew that there is no need to render or paraphrase it as Boza and Wolfius would do, "That the men came to join with those female friends who had before attended the mourning sisters, and were now with them." The word Ἰουδαίοι, Jews, to be sure includes persons of both sexes.—See also Raphel, Not. ex. Xenoph. p. 137.

2 That they might comfort them, &c. Many ceremonies used by the ancient Jews in mourning for the dead and in comforting the mourners are collected by Dr. Lightfoot (in his Hor. Hebr. on this place); but the mention of them here would be tedious, rather than edifying.

2 Sat weeping in the house.] She probably sat on the ground, which was the posture of mourners. Compare Job ii. 8. Ezek. viii. 14. and Mat. xxvii. 61.

That...
On meeting Martha he declares her brother shall rise again.

22 But I know, that even now whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee.

23 Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again.

24 Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day.

25 Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live;

26 And whosoever liveth, and believeth in me, e That is living and believes in me, shall never die.] The sense that I have given in the paraphrase appears to me the most consistent sense that can be made of these remarkable words, and the equivalent passages: John v. 24, and viii. 51. And a very sublime and important sense it is, perfectly agreeable to the height of sentiment and language with which Christ is said elsewhere to have abolished death, and to have destroyed the devil (2 Tim. i. 10, and Heb. ii. 14), and with which Christians are said to be come to the heavenly Jerusalem, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, &c. (Heb. xii. 25, 23), and to be raised up with Christ, and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, (Eph. i. 6.) See Faring, Orig. Sac. Lib. ii. cap. 7, § 9—18. To render the words before me, as Mr. Massey would do (Vernae Sacrae, p. 8.) "Whenever, while he lives, believes on me, shall not death shall be so disarmed and transformed that it shall hardly deserve the name; the better part of him being immediately conveyed to immortal life and glory, and the body only sleeping a while in the dust, till I come to awaken it to everlasting vigour and joy. Dost thou, Martha, believe this to be true?

27 And she says to him, Yes, Lord, I firmly believe everything thou sayest; for I am fully persuaded that thou art the Messiah, the Son of God, who was to come into the world, and has been so long promised, expected, and desired; and that all power therefore must belong to thee.

28 And Martha having said these words, and testified her faith, Jesus inquired for her sister; and presently she went away, and called her sister Mary as privately as she could, whispering in her ear, and saying, The Master is hard by, she immediately arose, and, having left the company that were about her, came forward with utmost eagerness to meet him. Now Jesus was not yet entered into the village, but still continued in the place where Martha met him, waiting there for Mary’s coming.

31 The Jews then who were with her in the house, attempting to comfort her under her sorrow, seeing that Mary arose up hastily and went out of doors, followed her, saying, Surely she is going to the sepulchre of her brother, that she may weep there, which will only aggravate and renew her sorrow; let us therefore endeavour to dissuade her from it. And thus, by their going after her, they were naturally led to be eyewitnesses of all that followed.

32 Then Mary, when she came to the place where Jesus was, and saw him, was so far from being afraid to avow her regards to him (compare John ix. 22. sect. cxxx,) that she fell down at his feet, and embraced them with the greatest respect, not die for ever, or eternally, is both obscuring and enervating their sense, and (as I have shown elsewhere, note 1 on John iv. 14. Vol. I. page 163, and note b, c on John viii. 51, 52. Vol. I. p. 542, 543) is grounded on a criticism which cannot agree with the use of the phrase in question in parallel passages. Compare Mat. xxi. 19. sect. cxix.—The opposition between this and the preceding verse plainly shews that the former refers to the spirits of those who were dead, who are yet spoken of as believing in Christ; and is, I think, no contemptible proof of their remaining in a state of activity: but the doctrine is so very plain in scripture as not to need the aid of such consequential arguments. (She is going to the sepulchre, that she may weep there.) How customary this was among the ancients is particularly observed by Eisler, Observ., Vol. I. p. 330.

27 She saith unto him, Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world.

28 And when she had so said, she went her way, and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Master is come, and calleth for thee.

29 As soon as she heard that, she arose quickly, and came unto him.

30 Now Jesus was not yet come into the town, but was in that place where Martha met him.

31 The Jews then which were with her in the house, and comforted her, when they saw Mary, that she rose up hastily, and went out, followed her, saying, She goeth unto the grave, to weep there.

32 Then when Mary was come where Jesus was, and saw him, she fell down at his feet, saying Mary comes to him, and is followed by the Jews.

33 When Jesus, therefore, saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the Spirit, and was troubled.

34 And said, Where have ye laid him? They say unto him, Lord, come and see.

35 Jesus wept.

36 Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him. 37 And some of them said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?

38 Jesus therefore, seeing him in tears, said, 39 Behold how he loved him, and how his heart overflows with sorrow for his death. But some of them, who had a secret aversion to him, said, Could not this man, who is said to have opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that this man also should not have died? Could he not have come to cure him, or, as it is reported in some other instances, have effected it even at a distance?

Jesus therefore, understanding this invidious insinuation, and groaning again within himself, as in great anguish of heart, comes to the sepulchre. Now it was a cave, and a large stone was laid upon the mouth of it. Jesus says to them that stood by, Remove the stone which stops up the entrance; but Martha, the sister of the deceased,

5 Jesus says, remove the stone, &c.] Our Lord (as Bishop Hall justly observes) could with infinite ease have commanded the stone to roll away of itself, without employing any to remove it; but he judiciously avoided all unnecessary pomp and parade, and mingled all the majesty of this astonishing miracle with the most amiable modesty and simplicity. There is no reason to imagine, as some do, that ceased, says to him, Lord, he has been dead so long, that he now smells in an offensive manner\(^1\); for he has been [here] no less than part of four days, this being the fourth since his interment.

40 (Compare ver. 17.) Jesus says to her, Why dost thou object against what I direct? Did I not say unto thee, that if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God remarkably displayed in a work of signal power and mercy?

41 Then they took away the stone from the mouth of the tomb where the deceased lay.

And when it was removed, Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee, that thou hast graciously heard me in those secret groanings of soul which I have been pouring forth in thy presence: And indeed I knew that thou always hearest me, and art most ready to answer all my petitions; but I now speak [thus] because of the multitude that is standing by, that they, comparing what they hear with what they are now to behold, may have increasing and more effectual engagements to believe that thou hast sent me.

43 And having said these words, he cried with a loud voice suitable to the majestic part which he was now acting, and the dominion he had even in the empire of death itself, as well as that he might be heard by all the multitude that were present, Lazarus come forth. And such an almighty energy went along with his word, that immediately, according to his command, he that was dead came forth, bound (as the dead usually were) about [his] feet and hands with grave-clothes, or with several rolls and foldings of linen that were wrapped about him, but which were so far loosened by the power of Christ as to permit him to move; and his face was also bound about with a napkin\(^4\). And Jesus, on his coming

the stone lay on the top of the cave, and that the corpse was let down with cords; for then Lazarus could not, without a farther miracle, have ascended of himself.
It is much more reasonable to believe the entrance was at the side of the sepulchre. Mr. Maundrell tells us (in his Journey to Jerusalem, p. 79) that the ruins of Lazarus's house are still shewn, and not far from thence his sepulchre, into which there is a descent of twenty-five steep stairs, which lead into two small rooms, in the farther of which the body is said to have been laid. But one cannot much depend on the genuineness of such antiquities.

\(^1\) He has been dead so long that he now smells, &c. The word "is" has the same ambiguity with this which I have used, and seems rather more decent than that in our translation, though the meaning is plainly the same.—Martha's mind seems to have been in a painful struggle, tosssed with a variety of passions, which prevented a perfect consistency in her behaviour.

\(^4\) His face was bound about with a napkin.] If the Jews buried as the Egyptians did, coming forth in this confined posture, says to them that stood by, unbind him, and let him go: for nothing more was needful to be done in a miraculous way, and he had strength enough to walk, his health and vigour being perfectly recovered with his life.

Thus was this illustrious miracle completely accomplished: and such was the effect of it, that many of the Jews therefore, who had come to visit Mary, and beheld what Jesus did, were so affected with this marvellous instance of his power, that they believed on him as the Messiah. But some of them were so obstinate and perverse, that they went away to the Pharisees, and told them what things Jesus had done, on purpose that they might inflame them, and stir them up to take some method to prevent his growing influence among the people.

IMPROVEMENT.

Let us by faith continually regard Jesus (as his discourses and actions concur to represent him) as the resurrection and the life; believing on this glorious specimen here given of it, that he can, and will finally cause all that are in the graves to hear his voice, and to come forth, (John v. 28, 29.) A most delightful thought, which we should often apply both to ourselves and to our pious friends! Let the consideration, that they are to arise in the resurrection at the last day, moderate our sorrows for their removal, and forbid our mourning as others that have no hope; (1 Thess. iv. 13.) Were a resurrection on earth expected, though at the distance of several years, we should consider them only as persons absent on a long journey, and expect their return with patience and cheerfulness: but oh, how much more certain is the resurrection of the just than the issue of any of our journeys or expectations in life!

We often go, in our thoughts at least, to the grave to weep; but let us not forget to raise our contemplations higher, even to Jesus who here expressed such tender sentiments of compassion, and wept when he saw the tears of others, though he knew he was going the face was not covered with it, but it only went round the forehead and under the chin, so that on his returning to life he might easily see his way out of the sepulchre.

1 Went away to the Pharisees, &c.] We have in this a most amazing instance of incorrigible hardness of heart, and a dreadful confirmation of our Lord's remark, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead. Luke xvi. 31. sect. cxxv.
ing to wipe them away by restoring that friend whom they lamented.—He afflicted himself; and it may be proper for us sometimes to Ver. do it, and to hold down our thoughts to those views of things which may give us pain and regret; if that attention be so adjusted and tempered as only to produce a sadness of the countenance that may improve the heart. (Eccles. vii. 3.)

plause, and all fondness for ostentation and parade. Like Jesus let us in all our ways acknowledge God, and maintain a continual dependance on his influence, to be sought by fervent prayer; and then we may go forth to every duty with a courageous and cheerful assurance that he will carry us honourably and comfortably through it. Let us but steadfastly believe, and we shall see the glory of God: he will manifest his power for our help; and when our case appears to be remediless, then is the time for his almighty hand to save.

41, 42 Let us adore and trust in him who was armed with so divine a power as to be able to rescue the prisoners of death, and to recover the trophies of the all-conquering and devouring grave. And if we are true believers, let us learn to take our part in the triumph with a joyful assurance, that though we putrify in the dust, and after the skin worms devour our bodies, yet in our flesh we shall at length see God. (Job xix. 26.)

It was surely a happy time that succeeded all the lamentations of these affectionate mourners. With what mutual congratulation and unutterable endearments did Lazarus and his sisters behold each other! With what humble gratitude and adoration did they all prostrate themselves at the feet of their Almighty Saviour! But who can conceive the greater transports which shall run through the whole redeemed world at the resurrection day, when piety and friendship shall be perfected, and those who were dearest to each other, both in the bonds of nature and of grace, shall spring up together to an immortal undivided life! In the mean time, let us trust our friends with him (with whom, if we are Christians indeed, we have trusted our souls), believing that the separations he appoints are prudent and kind, and that even our prayers for their recovery are denied in mercy.
The sanhedrim consulting how to deal with Jesus.

SECT. CXLI.

The sanhedrim being informed of the resurrection of Lazarus, by the advice of Caiaphas, agree that Jesus should be put to death. He retires to Ephræm, and they issue an order for apprehending him. John XI. 47, to the end.

John XI. 47.

IT was before observed (at the close of the last section) that some who had been present at the resurrection of Lazarus, instead of being duly wrought upon by the miracle, went away and made an invidious report of it to the Pharisees: the chief priests therefore and the Pharisees, who were united in their enmity to Christ, being exceedingly alarmed at so astonishing an information, convened the sanhedrim, which was the great council of the Jewish nation, and said, What are we doing in this strange conjuncture of affairs? Why do we seem to be dreaming, when things are come to such a crisis? It is of absolute necessity that some effectual method should immediately be taken; for it is not to be denied that, by some means or other, this man, whom we have been so solicitous to suppress, does many of the most surprising miracles that were ever seen or heard of: And if we suffer him [to go on] thus uncontrolled, all the populace will believe on him as the promised Messiah, and will acknowledge him as the king of Israel; and what can we expect will be the consequence of this, but that the power of the Romans, so vastly superior to ours, will be armed against us, and their legions will come and take away both our place and nation; they will destroy Jerusalem, and this sacred temple where we are now assembled, and will extirpate all the people who are committed to our guardianship and care.

And, while some of the council seemed apprehensive of the danger of attempting any thing against Jesus, one of them [even] Caiaphas, who, among the many sudden revolutions which happened in the government about that time, was high priest that year in which Christ was crucified, said to them, while they were thus deliberating, 43 If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him; and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation.

48 And one of them named Caiaphas, being the high-priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all.

\[\text{Was high-priest that year.} \]\n
It is well known that the high-priesthood among the Jews was not annual; but the many revolutions about that time might justify such berating. You seem to know nothing at all of what the present urgency of affairs requires, or you would easily find out a remedy in the death of this Jesus, who occasions such an alarm: Nor is this to be scrupled, because he does not appear to have committed any crime which is made capital by our law; for do you not consider that the extreme danger of a state will justify such extraordinary steps as are necessary for its preservation; and that it is undoubtedly much better for us, that one innocent man should die for the security of the people, than that the whole nation he belongs to should perish by our scrupling to take away his life?

Now this, by the way, was a very remarkable saying; and it is to be observed, that he spake it not merely of himself, but being high-priest that year, and so a person of the greatest dignity and authority, he was moved by a secret impulse from God to utter these words, which might be esteemed as an oracle, and were capable of a much higher sense than he apprehended; and by them he in effect prophesied: that Jesus should shortly die for the security, redemption, and happiness of the Jewish nation: And indeed, not for the Jewish nation alone, but for all the nations of the earth, even that he also might gather together into one glorious and happy society all the chosen children of God that are dispersed abroad in the most distant places and ages, among the Gentiles as well as the Jews.

From that very day, therefore, the members of the sanhedrim in general (though some particular persons were averse to their proceedings,) having thus resolved upon the death of Jesus, sought for an opportunity to execute the malicious purpose they had formed, and united their counsels, that they might find out some convenient method to slay him.

For

such a manner of speaking, which signifies no more than in those days, or at that time. (Compare Deut. xxvi. 3. Josh xx. 6. Ezek. xxxviii. 8, and Mal. iii. 4.) See Dr. Lardner’s Credibility, Part i. Vol. II. p. 878, 879.

b Being high-priest that year, he prophesied:] The Jewish high-priests had in former ages been often under the inspiration of a prophetic spirit: there was therefore some peculiar congruity in putting this oracle into his mouth, and the dignity of his office would add some peculiar weight and regard to what he said.—It is a strange fancy of Dr. Lightfoot that Caiaphas knew Jesus to be the Messiah, and that the sanhedrim founded their apprehension of danger from the Romans, in consequence of the regard shewn to him, on a ridiculous interpretation of Isa. x. ult. and xi. 1. whence they inferred that the destruction of the temple should quickly succeed the coming of the Messiah. See his Hor. Heb. on John xi. 45, 51.

50 Nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not.

51 And this spake he not of himself; but being high-priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation:

52 And not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.

53 Then from that day forth they took counsel together for to put him to death.
For this reason Jesus, who knew the secret resolution they had formed to take away his life, walked no more openly among the Jews in those parts till the appointed hour for his suffering was come; but, instead of visiting Jerusalem, he went away from thence, even from Bethany where he now was, into the country near the wilderness of Judea, to a little city called Ephraim, which lay not far from Bethel on the confines of the tribe of Benjamin; and there he continued a while with a few of his select disciples, and afterwards took a little journey eastward, towards the banks of the river Jordan, from whence he had lately come to Bethany on account of Lazarus's death.

And soon after this the Jewish passover drew near; and many went up from all parts of the country to Jerusalem, some little time before the passover, that they might purify themselves by some preparatory sacrifices, in order to be ready for the celebration of that solemn festival; (Compare 2 Chron. xxx. 17.) Then, as the people came together, they diligently sought for Jesus there, some of them being desirous to see and hear him, and others wanting to discover him to his avowed enemies the Pharisees: and as it could not but be generally known that the surprising miracle which he had lately wrought had very much inflamed the rage and envy of his persecutors, they were suspicious whether he would venture to appear in public, and said one to another, as they stood in the temple, What think ye of his coming to the passover? Do you suppose that, after this alarm, he will not have the courage to come to the feast? But both the chief priests and the Pharisees, concluding that he would not fail to come according to his usual custom, no longer dispersed their malice, but published a mandate, by which they had given an express command, that if any one knew where he was, he should immediately declare it to them,

To a city called Ephraim.] This city (which is mentioned with Bethel, 2 Chron. xiii. 12.) is by some called Ephrem, and is generally supposed to have lain in the north-east part of the lot of Benjamin. See Roland's Palestin, p. 376, and compare note a on Lukexiii. 23, p. 15.

a Took a little journey eastward, &c. This we have reason to suppose, or Jericho would not have lain in his way to Jerusalem, which yet we find that Jesus passed through in his return. See Luke xix. 1, sect. exlii.

b That they might purify themselves by some preparatory sacrifices.] Dr. Lightfoot (in his Hor. Heb. on this place) has shewn, that as a variety of circumstances might happen to multitudes which would require purification, so some sort of cleansing required no less than seven days.
Reflections on the malice and rage of Christ's enemies.

then, that they might apprehend and bring him to his trial, as a disturber of the public peace, and a person dangerous to the state.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. Where shall we find such restless, such causeless, such incorrigible malice, as was in the hearts of these rulers against our blessed Saviour? What but Divine grace can reclaim men, when to have heard of the resurrection of Lazarus from their own friends and confidants, who had just been eye-witnesses of it, instead of conquering their hearts, served only to inflame their murderous rage!

This is an instance where we evidently see the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there, (Eccles. iii. 16.) The high-priest lays down a most dangerous, though plausible, maxim, which is in effect no other than this, "That the murder of an innocent person by forms of law" (which, as a noble sufferer observed, is surely the worst kind of murder,) "may, even of a person who by miracles demonstrated that he was an ambassador from God, was to be chosen, rather than by protecting and obeying him, to give umbrage to an earthly power which seemed superior to their own." When will the politicians of this earth learn to trust God in his own ways, rather than to trust themselves, and their own wisdom, in violation of all the rules of truth, honour, and conscience?

Till then, like this foolish ruler, they will be caught in their own craftiness; and it is more than possible that they may, in many instances, hasten the very distress they are contriving to avoid. For this was here the event: the Romans (called therefore the people of Messiah the Prince, Dan. ix. 26.) were sent as executioners of the Divine vengeance, and the Jews were given up to a spirit of discord and madness, the terrible effects of which were such as cannot be read without horror, till their place and nation were taken away; nor could even the Roman general forbear declaring that the hand of God was apparent in their destruction.

Let us attend to this Divine oracle which God saw fit to put into the mouth of so wicked a man. Jesus has actually died for the people, even for all the children of God that are scattered abroad. His death is substituted instead of theirs; and by it they are redeemed and delivered, and shall ere long be incorporated together, and all the happy colony be raised to an abode of eternal glory. Blessed harvest, which springs up from redeeming blood! Heroic love of the dear Redeemer, which at the proper time brought him him to Jerusalem, where he knew that evil was determined against him! Let us follow him, in a courageous adherence to God and our duty, in the midst of danger and opposition; and not wonder if we are set up as the marks of infancy and reproach, when we see Jesus, marked out by a public mandate, as if he had been a robber or a murderer; and find so numerous and grand a court of judicature requiring their subjects to seize this most generous Friend of the whole world as the grand enemy of God and his country.

SECT. CXLII.

Christ, setting out on his last journey to Jerusalem, prophesies of his sufferings there: rebukes the ambition of James and John; and renounces his exhortations to humility. Mat. XX. 17—28. Mark X. 32—46. Luke XVIII. 31—34.

Mark X. 32.

And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus went before them; and they were amazed, and as they followed they were afraid. And he took again [Luke, unto him] the twelve [disciples apart in the way.] and began to tell them what things should happen unto him; [and said unto them.] [Mat. xx. 17. Luke xviii. 31.]

Mark X. 32.

At length our Lord departed from the place of his retreat, and though he knew the resolution that his enemies had formed against him, yet he set out with his disciples, and (taking Jericho in his road) was determined to make his appearance in the temple at the approaching passover: and as, in pursuance of this design, they were in the way going up to Jerusalem, Jesus to shew his readiness to meet sufferings and death in such a cause, went before them; and they were exceedingly amazed at the spirit and ardour which he discovered in so dangerous an expedition; and as they followed him they were afraid, both for themselves and him. And, while their hearts were thus impressed, he took the twelve disciples again apart to himself, into a convenient retirement which they met with by the way, and began particularly to tell them what things should befal] him in that important journey, that he might thus prepare them for the sufferings he should undergo, and that the accomplishment of his predictions might be some confirmation to their faith during a series of events which he knew would so severely try it. And he said to them,

Behold, and observe what I say; We are now going up to Jerusalem, and it is the last journey of this kind we shall ever take; for now all things which are written by the ancient prophets, concerning the sufferings of the Son of man, shall be exactly fulfilled; and the Son of man shall be betrayed

VOL. II.
By the way he foretells his death and resurrection.

Mark X. 33. betrayed by one of his own company, who has professed the greatest duty and affection to him, [and] shall be ungratefully delivered to the chief priests and the scribes, particularly to those who constitute the sanhedrim, and who have already published so severe an edict against him (John xi. 57, sect. clxi.) and, when they have him thus in their power, they shall with great formality condemn him to death, as a public enemy and disturber: and, as they have not now the power of capital executions in their own hands, they shall deliver him up to the Gentiles, even to the Roman governor and his soldiers; and they, instigated by the malice of the Jews, and utterly ignorant of the dignity and glory of his person, shall mock and spitefully entertain him in the most contumelious and reproachful manner, and shall cruelly scourge him, and carry their rude outrage to such a height, that they shall even spit upon him; and when this scene of mockery is over, they shall put him to a most ignominious and painful death; and, as if he was a common slave, shall even crucify him, and leave him to expire in the gradual agonies of the cross: and yet all their malice shall not be able to triumph over him; for on the third day he shall rise again, victorious over the powers of darkness, and take possession of that glorious and universal kingdom which the prophets assign to the Messiah. (Compare Mat. xvi. 21, sect. lxxxix. and Mat. xcii. 22, sect. xcii.)

Luke xviii. 34. And, plain as this declaration was, their prejudices were so great, that they did not understand any of these things thoroughly, being at a loss to reconcile his being slain with the possession of that kingdom which he was to inherit: and

\[\text{shall be betrayed and delivered, &c.}\]
The word \textit{vanjiskewad}, is the same both in Matthew and Mark; but plainly includes both his being treacherously discovered by Judas and given up into the hands of his enemies. I have therefore retained the different words by which our translators render it, in the one place and the other.

\[\text{They shall—scourge him, and spit upon him, and crucify him.}\]

This prediction is a remarkable proof of the prophetic Spirit which dwelt in Christ; for, humanly speaking, it was much more probable that he should have been privately assassinated or murdered, (as was before attempted) by some zealous transport of popular fury, than that he should have been thus solemnly condemned, and delivered up to crucifixion; a Roman punishment with which we do not find he had ever been threatened. Indeed when the Jews condemned him for blasphemy, for which the punishment appointed in the law was stoning, and Pilate at last gave them a general permission to take him and judge him according to their own law (Mat. xxvi. 65, 66. John xviii. 31. and xix. 7.) it is wonderful they did not choose to stone him: but all this was done that the scriptures might be fulfilled. (Compare Mat. xxvi. 56. and John xix. 36.) and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken.

Mat. XX. 20. Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children, with her sons [James and John,] worshipping him, and desiring a certain thing of him, [saying, Master, we would that thou should do for us whatsoever we shall desire.] [Mark x. 35.]

Mark. X. 36. And he said [unto her, and] unto them, [What wilt thou? or] What would ye that I should do for you? [Mat. xx. 21.]

37 [She saith unto him, Grant that these my two sons,] and they said—Grant unto us, that we may sit, the one on thy right-hand, and the other on thy left-hand, in thy kingdom and glory. [Mat. xx.—21.]

and this matter was hid from them to so great a degree that, after all our Lord had said, they knew not the meaning of the things which were spoken. (Compare Luke ix. 44, 45, Vol. I. p.483.)

Nevertheless they apprehended thus much, that whatever difficulties lay in the way, they should certainly end in his triumph and glory. And upon this presumption then the mother of Zebedee's children came at their instigation to him, with her sons James and John, who were peculiar favourites of our Lord; and they all three fell down at his feet, worshipping [him] in a most respectful manner, and desiring a certain [favour] of him with great importunity, weakly saying; Master, we would earnestly beg, that thou shouldest give us a general promise to do for us whatsoever we shall request of thee; for it would be a very great grief to us if we should not succeed in the important petition we have to present.

And he said to her [and] to them, You cannot expect that, whatsoever kindness I have for you, I should at all adventures enter myself into so rash an engagement: tell me therefore particularly, What wouldest thou have? [or] What would you so earnestly desire that I should do for you, if I was fully disposed to grant your request?

She says unto him, I entreat thee to grant that these my two dear sons, to whom thou hast shown so much regard, and who are so zealous for thy cause and interest, may be preferred to stations of the highest dignity, trust, and profit; [and] they joined with her in the same request; and said, Grant us, that when thou art established in thy glorious kingdom, which, as we apprehend, will shortly be erected in the world, we may not only have a place there, but may be fixed near thy throne, and sit in distinguished honour and authority, the one at thy right-hand, and the other at thy left, as thy chief ministers of state.

But Jesus said to them in reply, Alas! you are

We may sit, the one at thy right-hand, and the other at thy left.] There may perhaps be an allusion in these words to a circumstance which the Talmudical writers relate concerning the sanhedrim; that there were two officers of peculiar distinction, who sat on each side of the na?z or president of the court; the one called Ab Beth Din, or the father of the judiciary, who sat on the right-hand of the president; the other Chacham, or the sage, who sat on the left. See, among many other writers on this head, Whit. Miscell. Sacr. Vol. I. lib ii. Dissert. 3, § 46, 47.

under the force of such carnal prejudices and mistaken views, that you know not what you ask, or you would be ashamed of so unseasonable a petition. This is not a time to think of temporal grandeur and authority; but it is much more proper that I should ask you, and that you should put the question to yourselves, Are you able to drink of the bitter cup of which I am now about to drink so deep, and to be baptized with the baptism, and plunged into that sea of sufferings with which I am shortly [to be] baptized, and, as it were, overwhelmed for a time? And they say to him, with a self-confident assurance, Yes, Lord, we doubt not but that for thy sake we are able to undergo all this.

23 And Jesus says unto them, You shall indeed both of you drink of this my cup of which I am to drink, and be baptized with the baptism of extreme sufferings with which I am to be baptized; for you shall endure great extremities for the sake of my gospel, and hazard your lives in its defence: but as to what you have now desired, to sit on my right-hand, and on my left, in my kingdom of glory, this is not a privilege which is mine to give by partial friendship, or to the first and most importunate asker; nor can I dispose of it to any but [to those] for whom it is prepared by my Father, who has appointed that the exaltation and happiness of the other world shall be proportioned to the degrees of piety and holiness which are attained in this.

24 And when the ten other apostles heard [of it] and were acquainted with this motion which the sons of Zebedee had made, they began to be much displeased that they should aspire to a superiority to Jesus answered and said [unto them,] Ye know not what ye ask; Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? [And] they say unto him, We are able. [Mark x. 38, 39.—]

23 And [Jesus] saith unto them, Ye shall drink indeed of my cup [that I drink of,] and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with: but to sit on my right-hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father. [Mark x. 39, 40.]

24 And when the ten heard it, they [began to be much displeased, and] were moved a To drink of the cup, &c.] It was customary among the ancients to assign to each guest at a feast a particular cup, as well as dish; and by the kind and quantity of the liquor contained in it, the respect of the entertainer was expressed. Hence cup came in general to signify a portion assigned (Psalm vii. 5, xxiii. 5), whether of pleasure or sorrow; and many instances occur in which it refers to the latter. Compare Psalm xi. 6; Lxxii. 10; Isaiah li. 17, 22; Jeremiah xviii. 15, 17; Zechariah xii. 2; John xiii. 11; and Matthew xxiii. 59, 42.

b You shall indeed drink of my cup, &c.] Accordingly it is observable that this James was the first of all the apostles who suffered martyrdom for Christ: (Acts xii. 2.) And John was scourged by the Jews (Acts v. 40); and afterwards banished by Domitian into the Isle of Patmos, where he speaks of himself as a companion of Christ's tribulations (Rev. i. 9.) Not to mention Tertullian's tradition, that at Rome he was plunged into boiling oil; by which it is said, instead of being destroyed, he was sensibly refreshed (Tertull. Praecept. cap. 56): nor what the pretended Prochorus says of the attempt made by some heretics to poison him; which is generally referred to in the pictures of this apostle where the venom is ridiculously represented as coming out of the cup in the form of a serpent, to signify that the poison did not take effect.

The princes of the heathen nations.] Mark expresses it by αὐτοῖς ἡ εἰρήνη τοῦ ἐπὶ τῶν ἐχθρῶν, which we render, they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles; but this (with Grotius, Curs. lib. i. cap. 3.) I take to be a pleonasm, and think it should be translated, they who rule over the Gentiles; and so it coincides with the clause inserted from Matthew. (Compare 1 Cor. xi. 16; xii. 23; xiv. 37; and Phil. iii. 4, Gr.) Instances are produced from the like use of the phrase in the best Greek authors by Mr. Blackwall, in his Sacred Classics, Vol. i. p. 74, to which may be added, τῶν ἐχθρῶν; adlux, for adiakm, Polyb. lib. i. cap. 3, and τῶν ἐν υἱώπη κοινῶν Epictet. Enchirid. cap. 30, § 11.

Instead of appointing any one among you as the chief, &c.] As the request of these two brethren plainly showed that they did not understand our Lord's words to Peter (Mat. xvi. 18, 19, sect. xxxviii.) as designed to invest him with any authority over the rest of his brethren, so the answer which Christ here gives them, far from intimating any thing of that kind, concludes as strongly against any such authority as a negative argument can be supposed to do, and seems abundantly to justify the turn given in the paraphrase.
little fraternity, but of all that are about him; with all humility submitting to the meanest services, by which he may promote the spiritual interest and benefit of others.

And wonder not that this should be required of you, when you consider how great an example you have of this temper in him who is so far your superior; for even the Son of man himself, though a person of such illustrious dignity, and constituted to so glorious and lasting a kingdom, came not to be waited upon, but to serve others; and was not sent into the world to exercise a temporal dominion, and in a lordly way to rule over men, but to take upon him the form of a servant, and not only to labour, but to die for their good, and to give his own life as a ransom for many who had forfeited theirs to the justice of an offended God. Think not, therefore, that the disciples of such a self-denying Master are to dream of secular power, dominion, and grandeur; but rather study to mortify these very unbecoming desires after it.

And, quickly after this, they came to Jericho, where two blind men were cured by Christ, which was soon after followed with the remarkable conversion of Zaccheus, as will be seen in the next section.

And they came to Jericho.—

MARK X. 33, 34. Astonishing grace and compassion of the Son of God in going up to Jerusalem at this passover, when he so circumstantially knew all the things which were to befall him there! not only that he should be put to death, but in what manner he should suffer? and what cruelty and what scorn should introduce the last scene of his agonies! Yet, with so sad a prospect in his eye, he marched on with distinguished alacrity, leading the company, as if he longed to encounter what they could not bear to see, or even to hear of. Glorious Captain of our salvation, give us the like alacrity in all the sufferings we are called to bear for thee!

Who would not grieve to see these good apostles still so much possessed

[The servant of all.] There is a gradation here not commonly observed. The word δοῦλος in the former verse, which, for want of a better word, we render minister, is a name which might be given to any who occasionally attended others, or was statedly employed to render them any particular kind of service; but δοῦλος, servant, signifies one whose whole business it is to serve, and who is indeed the property of another. The words, of all, do likewise increase the gradation.
possessed with the spirit of this world, and still dreaming of preferment in a temporal kingdom? Who would not especially lament it, that his most intimate friends, James, and John the beloved disciple, should be the persons who should come to him with this strange request? Justly did our Lord answer them, You know not what you ask. And may not the same answer often be made to us? When therefore he denies us the great things that we are seeking for ourselves, let us be satisfied with the denial he sees fit to give us; believing that it is wisdom and love, and not unkindness, that produces it.

Let us often ask ourselves, Can we share the sufferings which our Lord endured? If we do not desire to do it so far as he shall appoint, we are not worthy to be called his disciples. Let us then gird up the loins of our minds, and wait our Master's signal to go forth to any suffering or service that he shall require; ever ready to make ourselves the servants of all, and therein to imitate the humility of the Son of man, who come not to be ministered unto, but to minister: yet, after all we can do or bear for him, let our trust still be in the merits of his righteousness and blood who gave his life a ransom for many. So shall we be fitted for those distinguished honours in the heavenly world, in comparison with which thrones and sceptres on earth are but empty pageants and childish toys.

SECT. CXLIII.

Our Lord, passing through Jericho in his way to Jerusalem, cured two blind men as he came out from thence, and converted Zaccheus, the publican. Mat. XX. 29, to the end. Mark X—46, to the end. Luke XVIII. 35, to the end; XIX. 1—10.

AND as he went out of Jericho with his disciples, [a great multitude followed him.] [Mat. xx. 29.]

MAT. XX. 30 ——

And behold, [Luke, it came to pass, that as he was come nigh unto Jericho,] Two blind a As he was yet nigh unto Jericho.] In our translation it is rendered, as he was come nigh unto Jericho; but the original, γ ακο ερομαι γαρ εν Ιεριχω, only signifies, when, or while he was that Two blind men sat begging by the way-side, as beggars used to do in places that are much frequented; [the one] of whom was well known by the name of Bartimeus, that is, the son of Timeus: And hearing the noise of a great multitude passing by, he, together with his companion, asked what that unusual concourse of 37 people meant, and how it was occasioned. And they told him that Jesus of Nazareth, that celebrated Prophet who had performed so many miracles, was coming by, and a vast number of the people of the town were with him. And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, as he had frequently been told what remarkable cures of this kind he had performed in other places, he could not but look upon it as a happy circumstance that he was now passing by the very place where he sat; and immediately he began to cry out with a loud voice, and with great eagerness to say, Jesus, thou Son of David, thou great and glorious Messiah, pity my sad condition, and have mercy on me! [yes, they both cried out, saying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David, and exert thy almighty power to deliver us from this deplorable darkness and distress!]

And some of the multitude who went before Jesus, rebuked them for their making such a clamour; and as the voice of Bartimeus distinguished itself on this occasion, many particularly charged him that he should be silent, and not be so importunate and troublesome: but they, knowing that if such an opportunity as this was lost it might never return, regarded nothing but the success of their petition, and therefore cried out a great deal the more earnestly, saying as before, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David! and was near it: compare Luke xix. 29;—to which may be added [in confirmation of the justice of this remark, which has been called in question by a writer of great eminence in the learned world], Luke x. 9; xv. 1; xvii. 40; Rom. xiii. 12; and the Septuagint version of Isa. 1. 8; Jer. xxiii. 23.—And it is necessary to understand it thus, in order to reconcile Luke's account of this miracle with that of Matthew and Mark, who both expressly say it was performed as he departed or went out of Jericho. Some have indeed fancied that he restored sight to one blind man as he entered, blind men, [the one Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, sat by the highway-side, begging.] [Mark x.—46. Luke xviii. 35.]

Luke xviii. 36. And hearing the multitude pass by, he asked what it meant.

And they told him that Jesus of Nazareth passeth by.

Mark x. 47. And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth [passed by, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me: [yes, they both cried out, saying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David.] Mark. xx.—50. Luke xviii. 38.

Mark xx. 31. And the multitude [Luke, which went before] rebuked them; and many charged him that he should hold his peace; but they cried the more [a great deal, saying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David, [Thou Son of David, have mercy on me.] [Mark in, and to another as he came out (see Lightfoot's Harmony, § lxix.); but this is improbable, especially considering how the multitude rebuked Bartimeus for his importunity, which surely they would never have done if such a cure as this had but just now been wrought at the other end of the same town.]

b The son of Timeus.] It is very probable Timeus might have been a person of some note in that neighbourhood, whose son, by a complication of calamities, fell both into poverty and blindness.
And Bartimeus especially repeated it again and again, saying, \textit{Thou Son of David have mercy on me, and help me!}

\textit{And Jesus, as he was advancing forwards in his way, observed how earnestly they cried; and as they still repeated their request, he graciously stood still, and ordered them both to be called[and] brought to him, that they might tell him what it was they so earnestly desired. And upon this the people had their expectations raised, and as they now concluded that they should see him work a miracle, they ran immediately to call the blind man and his companion, saying to him, as also to the other, \textit{Be of good courage, and rise up, for he calleth thee to him; and you may therefore hope that he intends to grant your request.}}

\textit{And Bartimeus joyfully received the message, and throwing aside his upper garment, that it might not hinder him a moment, he arose, and came to Jesus, with all possible haste and eagerness; the other blind man also following as fast as he could. And when he was come near, Jesus, to try his faith, and to encourage his dependence on his power and goodness, answered and said unto him, What is the mercy you so earnestly entreat? or what dost thou desire I should do for thee? And the blind man said unto him, Rabboni, that is, my Master and my Lord, the favour which I beg is obvious from the circumstance in which thou seest me, even that I may be so happy as to recover my sight, the loss of which I cannot but lament as a great calamity to me, from which I know that thou art able to deliver me. The other likewise by this time came up, making the same request; and they both joined to say, Lord, we beseech thee, that our eyes might be opened.}

\textit{Then Jesus had compassion on them both, and touched their eyes; and, as a testimony of his approbation of that eminent degree of faith which they had each of them expressed, and Bartimeus in particular in the strongest terms, he said to him and his companion, Be it unto thee as thou hast desired; receive thy sight, [and] go thy way; thy sensible of the calamity. Yet I acknowledge it appears from John ix. 11, 18, that the word is sometimes used in a greater latitude.}
thy faith has saved thee from the sad condition thou wast in; and if thou continuest to exercise it in a reliance upon me, thy eternal salvation and happiness will be secure,

And immediately their eyes were opened, and received sight, so that they now could see distinctly; and, with a grateful sense of their deliverance, they joined the company, and followed Jesus in the way to Jerusalem, glorifying God for this amazing instance of his goodness to them: and all the people likewise, when they saw [it], gave praise unto God, who in remembrance of his mercy had sent them so great a Prophet, to appear and act among them under the character of the Son of David.

And presently the news of this surprising miracle was spread abroad; and [Jesus] having entered (as was said before) into the city, and having passed through Jericho, a vast number of people had followed him from thence; and this new instance he had given of his miraculous power increased his fame through all the neighbourhood, and drew the multitude as he passed along in crowds about him.

And as he thus proceeded on his journey, behold, another most remarkable occurrence happened, in which the efficacy of his grace was signally displayed; for [there was] a man in that country whose name was Zaccheus, who was the chief among the publicans, or head-collector of the customs in those parts; and, having heaped up abundance of wealth by his gainful employment, he was very rich. And the great things which he had heard of Jesus made such a powerful impression on his mind, that when he was informed that he was coming by that way, he diligently sought an opportunity to see this celebrated Jesus, what sort of a person he was; but he could not compass his design because of the crowd about him; for he himself was very little of stature. And running therefore before the rest of the company, without regarding what they might think or say of him, he got up into a sycamore-tree, that he might see him there distinctly; for he perceived he was to pass that way, and the tree stood so near the road that he must go close by it. And Jesus, when he came to the place where he was, looked up, and saw him; and knowing his disposition, character, and circumstances, he immediately said to him, Zaccheus, made the whole.] [Mark x. 52. Luke xvii. 140.

Luke xix. 1. And Jesus entered and passed through Jericho.

And, behold, there was a man named Zaccheus, which was the chief among the publicans, and he was rich.

3 And he sought to see Jesus who he was, and could not for the press, because he was little of stature.

4 And he ran before, and climbed up, into a sycamore-tree, to see him; for he was to pass that way.

5 And when Jesus came to the place, he looked up and saw him, and said unto him, Zaccheus, make haste, haste, and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house.

6 And he made haste and came down, and received him joyfully.

7 And when they saw it, they all murmured, saying, that he was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner.

8 And Zaccheus stood, and said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold.

cheus, make haste and come down; for to-day I design thee a visit, and must abide for a while at thine house; and, fully satisfied that I shall be a welcome Guest, I take the liberty to invite my self thither. And Zaccheus was so overjoyed that Jesus should distinguish him in such a manner, that he came down with all the speed he could, and gladly entertained him at his house, thinking himself highly honoured by the presence of so excellent a Person.

And the Pharisees, and other self-conceited persons who saw [it], were very much offended at the particular regard that Jesus shewed him; and they all murmured, saying, He is gone in to refresh himself at a man’s house, who is certainly a notorious sinner, since he follows the scandalous employment of a publican.

But as Zaccheus now was quite another man than he had been before, and Divine Grace had changed his heart, that he might fully obviate these reflections, and manifest the truth of his conversion, he stood forth in the face of all the company, and said to the Lord with great reverence and affection, Behold, O Lord, I acknowledge the sins of my past life, and desire to testify my repentance for them by an entire and immediate reformation; as the first-fruits of which, I openly declare, that the half of my goods I give to the poor; and out of the remainder, if I wrongfully have taken anything from any man by injurious charges or oppressive claims, I am ready, not only to restore a fifth part more than the principal (which is all that the law requires in such cases besides the trespass-offering, Lev. vi. 2—5. and Numb. v. 7, 8,) but even to return [him] four-fold.

And

4 He is gone in to refresh himself, &c.] The phrase καθαρίσας παρα τῷ πορεύεσθαι properly signifies, to hait at a person’s house on a journey, referring to the laying down their own burdens, or loosing them from their beasts at such times and places. See Wolf. Vol. I. p. 733.

6 If I wrongfully have taken anything, &c.] The word ἀνωτάτου (as Heinsius has abundantly shewn) may properly signify any kind of oppression, especially under the pretence of law. (Compare Eccles. iv. 1. and v. 8. Septuag.) It seems therefore not so proper to limit it, as our translation does, to an injury done by a false accusation, which implies something of a formal trial, and defence of the party accused; whereas many frauds and oppressions might be practised by such a tax-gatherer where nothing of this sort occurred.

7 Restore him four-fold.] This was the utmost that the Jewish law required, even in cases of a fraudulent concealment and conviction (unless where an ox had been killed or sold, and so its labour lost to the owner, and the discovery rendered more difficult; Exod. xxii. 1.) for the phrase of restoring seven-fold (Prov. vi. 31.) seems only proverbial, to express making abundant satisfaction. But if a man not legally convicted or accused, voluntarily discovered a fraud he had committed, besides his trespass-offering he was to add to the principal only a fifth part. Lev. vi. 5.

Zaccheus
And Jesus said to Zaccheus, and to them that were about him, Surely to-day is salvation come to this house; and it is evidently to be seen that spiritual blessings are imparted to it, and designed for it, when such a penitent and religious temper is expressed; since, notwithstanding all the sins he has committed, it is now manifest that even this man also is a true son of Abraham, not only descended lineally from him, but of a character in some measure worthy of so honourable a descent. And therefore, notwithstanding all your murmurings, I rejoice in the consequences of this happy visit to him, as answering the great purposes of my life; for the Son of man, as I have formerly declared (Mat. xviii. 11. sect. xciv.) is come to seek and to save that which was lost; and it is the grand design of his abode on earth to recover those who, like this poor Zaccheus in his unconverted state, were wandering in the way to everlasting ruin.

IMPROVEMENT.

Thus did our Lord Jesus Christ, wheresoever he came, scatter blessings around him, both to the souls and the bodies of men. Who can wonder that Zaccheus had a curiosity to see such a person! And how happily did that curiosity end! Christ graciously observed him, and with an amiable frankness and openness of heart, invited himself to be a Guest at his house; choosing to accept the entertainment of a publican, and to distinguish with a particular regard one that was so desirous to see him. And let us diligently observe how happy a change this visit produced in the master of the family. O Zaccheus, well wast thou repaid for thine hospitality when salvation came to thine house, and the Saviour himself bore witness to thee as a son of Abraham!

Zaccheus therefore shews the sincerity of his repentance by such an offer.—Some commentators (with Salmainius, de Fen. p. 242) have remarked, that oppressive publicans were by the Roman law required to restore four-fold; but this was only after judgment obtained, where they had been guilty of extorting by force; whereas before conviction it was enough to make restitution of what had been taken; and even after it, in common cases, all that the law required was restoring twice as much. [Lec. loco Ven. i. quod. illece. &c.] But eredita esse. Digest. de Publicanis.]—Archbishop Tillotson justly observes, that had more, than an eighth part of Zaccheus's possessions been unjustly gotten, he could not have been able to make such restitution, after having given away half of what he now had to the poor, even though he had stripped himself of all. Tillotson's Works, Vol. III. p. 86.

Descended lineally from him.] The name of Zaccheus (which is the same with Zacci, Ezra ii. 9.) shews he was a Jew. See Lightfoot, Hor. Hebhr. in loc. and Salmainius, de Fen. p. 388.
What cannot the grace of God effect? This publican was in the morning contriving only how he might increase his estate by all possible methods of gain; and, before evening, he cries out, Lord Ver.

the half of my goods I give to the poor. Thus does the Spirit of Christ operate on the soul, producing in it the fruits of righteousness and charity to our fellow-creatures, as well as of love to God and faith in the Redeemer. And surely the miracle by which the walls of Jericho were many ages before thrown down by the sound of rams-horns, was not greater in its kind than that which now triumphed over the heart of Zaccheus, and threw down all the obstacles which corrupt nature had formed against the entrance of Christ into it.

Now were his eyes opened, and he saw in a moment how much more valuable the pearl of price was than all the riches he could part with to procure it. And he judged rightly of religion when he saw the necessity not only of faith, but of charity too; and not only of charity, but of restitution also to those whom he had injured, without which the highest pretences to charity are but presenting to God robbery, for a burnt-offering.

Our Lord's progress is marked with another work of Divine power and beneficence in opening the eyes of the blind. With what importunity was the cure desired! And when the petitioner was for a while discouraged, with what eagerness was that importunity repeated, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me! Thus will the sinner cry to Jesus when he sees how much he needs him. But, alas! men are not aware of their spiritual indigence and distress: they say they are rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing; and know not that they are wretched and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked. (Rev. iii. 17.)

When once they come to be awakened to a just sense of their case, there is then room for hope, and great encouragement for their address. We may in such circumstances say to them, as was 49 said to Bartimeus, Be of good courage, rise, he calleth thee. With pleasure should we deliver such a message; with pleasure should we lead on the lame and the blind, the weak and the trembling, in their application to Christ; and in all the instances, in which his victorious grace is exercised, should join with those who have received it in glorifying God, and in celebrating the praise of this Deliverer, whom he has mercifully raised up for his people.
The parable of the ten pounds.

SECT. CXLIV.

Christ delivers the parable of the ten pounds committed by a prince to his servants, and represents the vengeance taken by him on his rebellious subjects. Luke XIX. 11—28.

Now Jesus, on occasion of Zaccheus's conversion, having expressly said that he was come to be a Saviour, the people, as they heard these things, were ready to conclude that at his coming to Jerusalem he would openly declare himself to be the promised Messiah; but he continued [his discourse] and spake a very useful and instructive parable, because he was now drawing near to Jerusalem; and he perceived they thought that the kingdom of God would immediately be revealed among them, and that he, as the Messiah, would assume the government, and not only free Israel from the Roman yoke but spread his triumphs over all the heathen nations: In order therefore to rectify their notions on this head, and to warn them of the danger they would incur by rejecting him when they saw those secular views disappointed, he offered to their consideration this similitude; and said,

A certain person of a noble birth went to a distant country in order to receive, from a superior prince there, an investiture to a kingdom; which was then fallen to himself, and of which the place where he dwelt made a part; intending afterwards to return, and fix his residence in his own country. And before he set out on his journey, having called ten of his servants, he delivered

And as they heard these things, he added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear.

12 He said therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom; and to return:

13 And he called his ten servants, and delivered

3 Because he was near to Jerusalem.] The following parable considered in this view, as suited to the circumstance of time; and to the case of those to whom it was delivered, will appear a most wise and seasonable admonition; and by neglecting the instruction it was designed to give them; the Jews deservedly brought ruin on themselves.

b Went to a distant country to receive a kingdom, &c.] The parable seems to suppose this noble person to be the son of a prince, who, on some domestic or public revolution, was to enter upon the possession of his dominions, and to be confirmed in the government of them by the approbation of some more potent state; as the kings of Judea, and other neighbouring states, frequently were by the Romans: (See Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 14. (al. 26) § 4, 5, 5 & lib. xvii. cap. 9, al. 11.) He is therefore described as setting out with the view of being owned at his return as their undisputed sovereign. (See Le Clerc's Harmony, p. 397.) This representation of the matter is so natural, that one would wonder what room there could be for the controversy between Mallehansius and Athanasius de Paris about it. It is quite needless to pretend that this is an historical narration, that Archelaus is the nobleman referred to, &c.
The faithful servants are rewarded for their diligence.

14 But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, we will not have this man to reign over us.

15 And it came to pass, that when he was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded these servants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading.

16 Then came the first, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds.

17 And he said unto him, Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities.

He delivered to them ten pounds, lodging one pound in the hands of each, and said unto them, Trade with this money till I come back to take an account of your improvement. (Compare Mat. XIX. 13, xxv. 14, & seq. sect. clxv.)

But, in the mean time, some of his citizens, among whom he had before lived in a more private character and station, hated him, and sent an embassy after him, to prevent his establishment in his kingdom; expressly saying, We are at all adventures determined that we will not have this man to reign over us, and will endure all extremities rather than submit to his authority. And during his absence, which continued for some time, they thought themselves very secure in their insults.

But, notwithstanding all the confidence of these rebellious citizens, they were unable to prevent his exaltation to the throne, or to deprive him of the right he had of reigning over them. And it came to pass, that when he had received the kingdom, and was come back with the full powers that were granted to him, he commanded these his servants, to whom he had delivered the money, to be called to him, that he might know what improvement each of them had made.

And the first servant, who had gained the most, came near, and said, Sir, the improvement I have made of thy pound is such that it has gained ten pounds more. And when his lord had heard how diligent and careful he had been, he said to him, Well done, thou good ser- vant, since thou hast thus been faithful in a very little, I will amply reward it; for I will not only give thee for thine own this treasure of which thou hast been giving me so good an account, but as my dominion is now enlarged, and many towns and tracts of land are subject to me,

He delivered to them ten pounds.

The pound, or mite, as it is commonly called, contained sixty shekels, (Ezek. xlv. 12.) and therefore, according to the common calculation of the worth of a shekel, placing it at half a crown of our money, it was seven pounds ten shillings; but according to Dr. Prideaux, who sets the shekel at three shillings, the mite was nine pounds sterling.—Our Lord probably chose to mention this small sum to illustrate the munificence of the master in bestowing on the faithful servant so great and noble a reward. Compare ver. 17.

d Sent an embassy after him. This is expressed in such a manner as may intimate their sending ambassadors to the superior court, to enter their protest against his being admitted to the regal power, and to declare their resolution to oppose his accession. And so it well represents the solemn manner in which the Jews renounced Christ, acting as in the name of the Lord, and with a pretended zeal for his authority and glory.
me, I will advance thee to a most honourable station under me, and be thou governor over ten cities.

And the second came, and delivered in his account, saying, Sir, thy pound which was committed to me has been improved in such a manner that it has gained five pounds. And the improvement he had made was pleasing to his lord, and he said likewise unto this, Thou hast approved thyself a good and faithful servant, and I am pleased with thy diligence, and will reward it proportionably: be thou also governor over five cities.

And after him another servant, who had been negligent and slothful, came, and said, Sir, behold [here is] thy pound which was put into my hands; it is not at all diminished, but I have carefully kept it laid up in a napkin: For I feared thee, because I knew thou art an austere man, [who] takest up what thou didst not lay down, and reapest, or expectest to reap, what thou didst not sow: and therefore apprehending I might incur thy severity if any accident should befall this money in trade, I was determined not to venture it out of mine hands, and now return it just as I received it. But when his lord heard him offer such a vile and groundless charge against himself as an excuse for his own negligence, he was filled with indignation, and says to him, Out of thine own mouth will I condemn thee, O [thou] wicked servant: thou hast taken upon thee to affirm, thou knowest that I am an austere man, taking up, as thou expressest it, what I did not lay down, and reapeth what I did not sow; and thou mightest therefore on thine own principles conclude, that I should expect to gather where I had deposited such a sum of money, and to reap where I had thus sown: And if it had been so, and I had really been as severe as thou wouldest basely insinuate, why

It is observable, that in Mat. xxv. 20—23, sect. clxv. where the servants are represented as doubling the different sums intrusted to each, the reward is spoken of as the same; but here, the same intrusted being the same, and the improvement described as different, there is a proportional difference in the reward; which, as it is a beautiful circumstance, was, no doubt, intended for our instruction.

\[\text{Thou knowest that I am an austere man, &c.}.\] This is not an acknowledgment of the vile and detestable charge of God's demanding of men (as Dr. Guise well expresses it) more difficult services than he has furnished them for, or would assist them in; which is, as that pious writer truly observes, a most unrighteous thought of God: but his lord only argues with him on his own base principles, and shews, that even on them he would be justly condemned for his negligence.

Faithfulness and diligence shall be rewarded.

147 why didst thou not [then], for thine own security, give my mone into the bank, that when I came to call for it on my return, I might at least have received it with the common interest, if not with the extraordinary improvement which might have attended a successful trade?

And farther to testify his displeasure, he said to some of them that stood by, Take away the pound that was intrusted with him, from that idle, suspicious, unfaithful creature, who might otherwise have had that and much more allotted him for his own property, and give it to him that has ten pounds. But they were much surprised at his assigning it to one who had before received so ample a reward; and they said to him, Sir, he hath already no less than ten pounds, which, with the honour and preferment thou hast farther added, is surely an abundant recompense. Nevertheless, the prince stood by his former award, and bestowed the other pound likewise upon him; declaring, that his faithfulness and diligence was fit to be distinguished with the most favourable and repeated notice: and in this way it is, continued he, that I resolve to act; for I assure you, That to every one that hath, or that improves what he hath, [17] shall be given, and he shall have yet more abundantly; but from him that hath not, or that acts as if he hadnothing intrusted to his care, even that which he hath, and neglects to improve, shall be taken away from him. (Compare Mat. xiii. 12. xxv. 29. Mark iv. 25. and Luke viii. 18.)

And having thus inquired into the conduct of his servants, and treated them according to the different use they made of what had been entrusted with them, he then proceeded to pass sentence on his rebellious citizens who had refused to have him for their king; and with a just resentment of their base ingratitude, he said, But as for those mine enemies, who were determined to oppose my government, and, would not have me to reign over them, bring them hither immediately, and slay [them] with the sword

24 And he said unto them that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds.

25 (And they said unto him, Lord, he hath ten pounds.)

26 For I say unto you, That unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him.

27 But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, sword in my presence', that others may learn a more dutiful submission by the execution of these rebels.

Now all this was as if our Lord had said, Thus shall I at length appear, not as a temporal sovereign, but as the Great Eternal Judge and victorious Ruler over all, when, having received power and dominion from my Father, I shall bring all to their final account; and with infinite ease triumph over those who reject and affront my authority: take heed therefore that you be not found in their wretched number, as many will be who pretend most eagerly to desire the Messiah's appearance.

28 And when he had spoken these things, he continued his journey, and, leading the way, went on before his disciples, ascending to Jerusalem, being determined to appear there at the approaching passover, though he well knew that he was to encounter persecution and death there.

(Application Mark x. 32, sect. cxlii.)

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. Let us also hear and fear. Our Lord, is gone, and has received 12 his kingdom. He has delivered to us our stock, to be improved in his 13 service: let us be animated to diligence in it; for proportionable to that diligence will be our reward. Let us remember we labour 17, 19 for ourselves while we labour for him; as all the progress we make in wisdom and in goodness renders our own souls so much the happier, and will render them so to all eternity. Blessed servants that have the applause of such a Master, and share a reward as liberal as that conferred on a faithful steward, who should be made governor of a province containing ten cities.

19, 21 Let us beware of a slothful neglect of our stock: let us beware of those hard thoughts of God which would discourage us from pursuing his service. Above all, let us take heed, that we do not proudly and insolently reject the government of his anointed Son, 14 and either say with our tongues, or declare by our actions, We will not have this man to reign over us: for if we do, we speak a word against our own lives. He will be glorified by us, or upon us.

1 Slay them with the sword in my pre-presence.] This is the exact import of the word ιχθεωναζηθ. It does indeed properly express the dreadful slaughter of the impenitent Jews, by the sword of each other, and of the Romans; but that does not seem the chief design of the passage, which plainly relates to the far more terrible execution which shall be done on all impenitent sinners in the great day, when the faithful servants of Christ shall be rewarded.

*When
Christ is entertained at Bethany.

And oh, what shall we do, if in that dreadful day he should bring us forth as the helpless prisoners of his justice, and command us to be slain in his presence! How can we withstand his power! Ver. or to the horns of what altar shall we flee for sanctuary? O Lord, our flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and we are afraid of thy judgments; (Psal. cxix. 120.) May we never be the miserable objects of them; but having faithfully served thee here, may that be to us a day of honour, reward, and triumph, which shall be to every presumptuous rebel a day of shame and terror, of dreadful execution and eternal destruction!

Christ is entertained at Bethany and his feet anointed by Mary.

JOHN XII. 1.

THEN Jesus, six days before the passover, came to Bethany, where Lazarus was, which had been dead, whom he raised from the dead.

Mat. XXVI. 6.—Now when Jesus was in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper. [Mark xiv. 3.]

a When Jesus was in Bethany.] Few passages in the Harmony have perplexed me more than this. I was long of opinion with Origen and Theophylact, defended by Le Clerc and Dr. Whitby, and especially by Dr. Lightfoot (Harm. N. Test. § 71, 80), and Mr. Whiston (in his View of Harmony, p. 128, 129), that the story recorded by Matthew (chap. xxvi. 6—15.) and Mark (chap. xiv. 3—9.) was different from that in John: but, on maturer consideration, it appears to me more probable, that Matthew and Mark should have introduced this story a little out of its place,—that Lazarus, if he made this entertainment (which is not expressly said by John) should have made use of Simon’s house, as more convenient for it,—and that Mary should have poured this ointment on Christ’s head and body, as well as on his feet;—than that within the compass of four days Christ should have been twice anointed with so costly a perfume; and that the same fault should be found with the action, and the same value set on the ointment, and the same words used in defence of the woman; and all this in the presence of many of the same persons: all which improbable particulars must be admitted, if the stories be considered as different. But, after all, I can assert nothing confidently; for there is no impossibility in the thing taken either way.

v In the house of Simon the leper.] It is not to be thought that he was now a leper; for in this case he would not have been suffered to live in a town, nor would the Jews have come to an entertainment at his house: but either he was once a leper, and had been cured by Jesus, or else the name was given to the family, as some considerable person in it, had been formerly a leper.

b When
In testimony of their high respect and great affection for him, they made a handsome supper for him there, and treated him in the evening; which was the usual time for entertainments with the Jews, especially on the evening of their sabbath-days, which was the season when this feast was made; and Martha, who had formerly distinguished her care on a like occasion (Luke x. 40, sect. cviii.), having seen that all things should be rightly ordered, waited on Christ at supper; but Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him.

3. Then Mary, the other sister of Lazarus, being deeply affected with the many instances that Christ had given her of his love, and especially with his late mercy to her family, in recovering so dear a brother from the grave, was solicitous to give some uncommon token of her gratitude and respect to so excellent a guest; she therefore took an elegant alabaster pot, or vase, containing about a pound weight of unadulterated ointment of spikenard, which was exceeding valuable; and, having broke the top of the vessel, or shook the perfumed balsam which was in it, that it might be the better liquified, and flow forth the easier, she came behind him, and poured out the greater part of it on his head, as he sat at meat, and anointed the feet of Jesus with the remainder; and, when she had done this, she, like the humble penitent mentioned above (Luke vii. 38, Vol. i. p. 314), wiped his feet with the long flowing tresses of her hair; and the whole house was filled with the fragrant and delicious odour of the ointment.

When this feast was made.] Though Matthew and Mark relate this story, where they are speaking of what happened but two days before the passover, it is more probable (as we have just now shewn) that it is placed by John in its due order; and as the following days appear to be sufficiently distinguished, and Christ's triumphant entrance into Jerusalem, which John has fixed to the next day (John xiv. 12, sect. exxi.), must have been on the first day of the week, this entertainment therefore was on the evening of the day before, when the Jewish sabbath was over.

Unadulterated ointment of spikenard.] I cannot take upon me absolutely to determine whether the word παρθένον signifies that the ointment was quite genuine and pure (as Casaubon and L. Capellus assert), or whether (as Grotius and Erasmus think) it be put for παρθένον, and refers to the particular part of the fragrant shrub arnurus, of which the ointment was made. (See Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. xii. cap. 12.)—If the latter be the meaning of it, what is said of its great value must justify our calling it unadulterated.

* Having broke the top of the vessel, or shook the perfumed balsam, &c.] Sir Norton Knatchbull and Dr. Hammond maintain that ἀνήλπαρθένον does not signify that she brake the vessel, which they think an improbable circumstance; but only that she shook it as to break the coagulated parts of the rich balsam, and bring it to such a liquidity that might be fit to pour out. Yet I must own that the original does not so naturally express this.
Mat. XXVI. 8. But when his disciples saw it, [there were some that had indignation within themselves, and said, Why was this waste of the ointment made? And they murmured against her.] [Mark xiv. 4—5.]

John XII. 4. Then saith one of his disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray him,

5 Why was not this ointment sold [for much, even for [Mark, more than] three hundred pence, and given to the poor? [Mat. xxvi. 2. Mark xiv. 5—]

6 This he said, not that he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein.

Mat. XXVI. 10. When [And they murmured against her.] Whether this relates to more than Judas cannot certainly be said; since it is well known that the plural number is sometimes put for the singular. See Gen. viii. 4; xix. 29; Judg. xii. 7; and Mat. xxvii. 44. Some have thought Judas Iscariot was the son of that Simon in whose house the feast was made; but the name was so common that it cannot be concluded with any certainty.

g More than three hundred pence. It is to be remembered that these were Roman pence, and consequently amounted to nine pounds seven shillings and six-pence: the expression only intimates a general guess at the value by a round sum (for such three hundred denarii were, though the correspondent value with us is not so); as if we should say, on a like occasion, it must have been worth above ten pounds.

But when his disciples observed it, there were some that were moved with inward displeasure at what appeared to them so great an extravagance; and said with a low voice to each other, Why was this waste of the ointment made, and such a quantity of this rich balsam poured out to so little purpose? And they secretly murmured against her, and could hardly refrain from rebuking her for it. One of his disciples therefore [even] Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon, that wretched person who was about to betray him, as if he knew not how to bear such waste, expressed a peculiar emotion, and said aloud, Why was not this fine ointment sold for a great deal of money; for it must have been worth [even] more than three hundred pence; and thus it might have served for the relief of many, if the price of it had been given to the poor? This would surely have been approved of by our Master, as a much wiser and better way of disposing of it, than thus to lavish it away on the luxurious entertainment of a few minutes. Now this he said, not because he at all regarded the poor, but because he was, notwithstanding all his pretended piety and zeal, a subtile thief; and as he kept the bag which contained their little stock, and carried what was put into it, he thought if so large a sum had come in just before he went off with it (which he was now preparing to do), he should thus have had a fine opportunity of enriching himself. But Jesus knowing the design of Judas, and perceiving that others were secretly joining with him.

i Carried what was put into it.] The learned Elssner (I suppose to avoid the seeming tautology) would render ἔφη γὰρ ἔδωκεν, he took away, or carried off, that is, for his own use, what was put into the purse or bag. He refers to John xx. 15, and Mat. ji. 11, viii. 17, as instances of such a use of it; to which he adds others from Polybius, Athenaeus, and other good authors. (Elss. Observ. Vol. l, p. 353.) But the meaning here may be, that he had not only the keeping of the bag at that time, but that it was his stated office to take care of it and manage its stock; and therefore I choose not to follow Elssner's version since ἔφη γὰρ never signifies to carry off a part privately, which would have been expressed by ἔφη ἔδωκεν, as it is Acts vi. 2.
him in this severe and uncharitable censure, without taking any notice of that vile principle from which he knew [it] proceeded in him, directed his discourse to his disciples, and said to them, Why do you give such trouble and uneasiness to the good woman, of whose piety and friendship we have had so long an experience? Let her alone in what she is about; for what she has now performed is a good work, and she deserves to be commended for the great respect she has been shewing towards me. For as to what has been suggested now in favour of the poor, you have them always with you; and providence will continually so order it, that some compassionate objects shall be still among you, that whenever you please you may have an opportunity to do them good: but me you have not always with you; for I am soon to leave you, and to be placed beyond the reach of your kindness. And indeed my departure out of the world is so near, that, with respect to this action of our friend Mary, which you are ready to condemn, I may say, that she has reserved this ointment for the day of my burial: And, not knowing whether she may have an opportunity of assisting in those last offices, she has now done what she could; for in that she has poured out this ointment on my body, she has in a manner come before the time thus to anoint and to embalm my body for the burial; so that you may almost look upon it as a work of piety and love to a dead friend, where a generous heart will not be sparing. And, on the whole, though you have such hard thoughts of what she has been doing, it shall not finally turn to her reproach or damage; but as I graciously accept it, so I assuredly say unto you, That wheresoever this gospel of mine is preached, and it in time shall have its triumph over the whole world, this very action

When Jesus understood it, he said unto them, Why trouble ye the woman? [let her alone;] for she hath wrought a good work upon me. [Mark xiv. 6. John xii. 7.—]

11 For ye have the poor always with you, [and whatsoever ye will, ye may do them good:] but me ye have not always. [Mark xiv. 7. John xii. 8.]

John xii.—7. Against the day of my burying she kept this.

Mark xiv. 8. She hath done what she could; [for in that she hath poured this ointment on my body,] she is come afore-hand to anoint my body to the burying. [Mark xxvi. 12.]

9 Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that [this woman] hath done, shall be spoken of for a memorial of her. [Mark xxvi. 13.]

She has reserved this for the day of my burial.] Mr. Whiston (in his View of the Harmony, p. 129.) thinks this is as if our Lord had said, "She has spent but a little of this ointment now; but has reserved the main part of it to pour upon my head some days hence, which shall be so near my death, that it may be considered as a kind of embalming." But besides the general reasons against believing the action repeated, which have been mentioned in note a, it is unnatural to suppose that, in the transport of her love and gratitude, she would use this little management of keeping back most that was in the vessel; or that if she had, John would have mentioned the quantity she took, which was no way to his purpose, or have taken notice of the room's being filled with the odour of it: not to say, that the prediction which Mr. Whiston supposes our Lord to utter, is quite trivial, and would seem to bespeak its own accomplishment in a manner which he never would have stooped to.
action also which this pious and affectionate woman has now performed shall be inserted in the history of my life, and be spoken of with honour for a memorial of her friendship and affection to me: so that her name shall be embalmed in such a manner, as to be far more fragrant than the perfume which she has poured forth on my head and my feet. (Compare Eccles. vii. 1.)

Now these things passed at a public entertainment: a great multitude of the Jews therefore, who had been dubious whether Jesus would come up to the passover or not (compare John xi. 56, sect. cxli.), quickly got intelligence of it, and knew that he was there in Bethany; and they came thither in crowds from Jerusalem, and that indeed not only on account of Jesus, who had been retired for some time, but also out of curiosity, that they might see Lazarus, whom he had lately raised from the dead, now appeared publicly with him.

But the chief priests, and other members of the sanhedrin, were filled on this occasion with such rage and envy, that, as they had already resolved on the death of Jesus, they consulted also how they might find some method to kill Lazarus, either by public prosecution or private assassination: For they well knew that many of the Jews deserted them, and went away to Bethany on his account, and were so powerfully struck with the convincing evidence of so astonishing a miracle, that they believed on Jesus; and while such a monument of his power and goodness continued they were afraid lest more should revolt to him.

IMPROVEMENT.

We see how happily Mary improved by sitting at the feet of Jesus, and what evidence she gave of her having chosen the better part. (Compare Luke x. 39, 42.) Like her, let us with humble thankfulness bestow our very best on him, who has given us that and every thing else. She gladly poured out her choicest ointment on him, whose name is to every true believer far more fragrant than oint-
Jesus, being come to Bethphage near Jerusalem, ointment poured forth. (Cant. i. 3.) How does her generous love shame those who grudge every expence in the cause of Christ!

When we are relieving the pious poor, we are, as it were, anointing the feet of Jesus: we are indeed performing a service far more acceptable than any thing of this kind could in itself be.

Ver. Let us remember that we have the poor always with us; and that they are permitted to continue among us that we may do them good whenever we please. Far be it from us to imagine that what we so spend is waste. Let all who would not share in the guilt and punishment of Judas abhor the vile hypocrisy of making a pretended concern for the poor a cloak for an opportunity of enriching themselves with their spoils; than which nothing can be more infamous, or can have a directer tendency to mingle the consuming curse of a righteous and almighty God with all that a man possesses.

The Pharisees conspired to kill Lazarus. What a mixture was this of cruelty and folly! What was his crime? or what could their hope be? From what death could not Christ have delivered him? or from what tomb could he not again have recalled him? Yet something like this is the madness of all who hate and persecute others for being the trophies of the Redeemer's victory and grace.

But let not his servants fear; their Redeemer is strong, the Lord of hosts is his name. (Jer. l. 34.) His work is perfect; and the day and hour is approaching in which his triumph over all his enemies shall be so complete, that his friends shall be for ever secure, not only from being destroyed, but from being alarmed by them.

SECT. CXLVI.

Christ rides in triumph to Jerusalem on an ass's colt. Mat. XXI. 1—9; Mark XI. 1—10; Luke XIX. 29—40; John XII. 12—19.

AND after Jesus had been anointed by Mary in the manner related in the preceding section, it came to pass on the next day, which was the first day of the week, that he proceeded on his journey with his disciples; and when they drew nigh to Jerusalem, and were come to Bethphage and Bethany, or to the outward boundaries of these two places, at the foot of the mount of Olives.

AND [Luke, it came to pass, [John on the next day,] when they drew nigh unto Jerusalem, and were come to Bethphage [and Bethany,] unto the mount of Olives, then sent Jesus two two of his disciples. [Mark xi. 1. Luke xix. 29. John xii. 12.—]

MARK XI. 4. And [the disciples] [Luke that were sent] went their way, and found [Luke, even as he had said unto them,] the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met; and they loose him, [as Jesus commanded them.] [Mat. xvi. 6. Luke xix. 32.]

LUKE XIX. 33. And as they were loosing the colt, certain of them

Olives, which lay to the east of the city, then, as the time appointed for his sufferings was just at hand, being resolved that he would make a public entry into Jerusalem, sent out two of his disciples, Saying, to them, Go your way into the village which lies yonder over against you; and immediately, as soon as you enter into it, you shall there find a she-ass standing tied at a door, and a young foal tied also with her, on which no man ever yet sate; lay hold of the foal, and untie him directly, without any scruple or concern about the owner's leave, and bring [him] hither to me: And if any man should 3 take notice of what you are doing, and say to you, Why do you offer to untie the foal, and lead [him] away? you in reply shall say thus to him, Because Jesus the Lord has need of him: and, in regard to the authority of my name and character, he will immediately send him hither with the dam, that I may use either of them as I shall choose, to ride into the city: so that you may bring them both hither, without any apprehension of accusation or scandal.

And the two disciples that were sent on this errand presumed not to debate the reasonableness of the orders he had given them; but previously went their way, and found, just as he had said unto them 4, the colt with its dam tied abroad at the door of a house, which stood in a very open place at the entrance of the village, where two roads met: and, as Jesus commanded them, they immediately began to untie the colt, that they might lead him away.

But as they were thus untwisting the colt, providence so ordered it, effectually to prevent any clamour or reflection, that the owners of it were near was fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem (as it is said, John xii. 18,) and the other that he now was come to, joined to the mount of Olives, and was but a sabbath-day's journey, or but eight furlongs distant from the city. (Compare Luke xxiv. 50. and Acts i. 12.) But it is hardly probable there were two places of the same name within a mile of each other; and it is much more natural to suppose that the limits of Bethany might extend to the mount of Olives, and be contiguous to the boundaries of Bethphage, which was part of the suburbs of Jerusalem, and reached from the mount of Olives to the walls of the city. See Lightfoot, Harmon. N. T. § 72, and Whitby on Mark xi. 1.

1 Just as he had said unto them. The exact knowledge which our Lord shewed of so many minute and most fortuitous particulars must surely impress the minds of these messengers greatly, and establish the faith of his followers. It is observable that many such things occurred a little before his death, which considered in this view, have a peculiar beauty. Compare Mat xxvi. 31—35. Mark xiv. 15, 16. and Luke xxi. 10—13.

e Effectually to prevent any clamour or reflection. Perhaps had not the owners of the near at hand, with several other persons. And some of them that stood by there, and particularly the owners of it said unto them, What are you doing there? Why do you offer to untie the colt, which you know is none of your own? And they said to them, even as Jesus had ordered, We mean no injury to you, or to the colt; but Jesus, the Messenger of the blessed God, the great Lord and Proprietor of all, has need of him, and would borrow him for a little while, to ride into the city; and his character is too well known to give you any reason to fear you shall lose any thing by your readiness to accommodate him in this little instance. And on this they were thoroughly satisfied, and let them go away with it.

And thus they brought the colt to Jesus, and the ass its dam went with it: and, as they had neither of them any saddle, they threw their loose mantles upon the backs of them both, that Jesus might take his choice which he would ride, and might sit the more easily and decently on either: and as he chose the colt, though (as was just now said) it had never been broke or backed before, they set Jesus thereon.

And many, [even] a very great multitude, who now surrounded him, as he sate on the young ass, and went on to the city, in token of their respect to him, spread their mantles in the way, that he might ride as upon one continued carpet; and others cut down little branches from the trees, the beast happened to be by, and had not Luke expressly mentioned them, the malle of ancient or modern infidels would have found some occasion for raising an outcry on the ambiguity of the words, The Lord has need of him. Its being a weak and contemptible cavil would not have prevented their using it, as we learn by abundant experience.

They let them go. If these people were not (as they possibly might be) the acquaintance of Christ, they might easily meet with him at Jerusalem, if they had a mind to inquire after the ass and colt; or they might be led according to their direction at some house in the city, or be sent back by some of our Lord's attendants; though the evangelists do not descend to such minute particulars.—There is no appearance of Christ's intending to shew his sovereignty in transferring the property of these creatures; and though, no doubt, he had a power to do it, his usual prudence would probably direct him to wave it at a time when so many eyes were upon him for evil.

They set Jesus thereon. As all the evangelists but Matthew speak expressly of his riding on the colt, what Matthew says of bringing them both to Jesus, and putting on them their clothes, and setting them thereon (though it be spoken in the plural number,) implies no more than setting him upon the mantles thrown on that which he made choice of, and is no intimation of his riding upon both.

As he sate on the young ass. John says that Jesus, when he had found a young ass, sate thereon; but as the larger accounts given by the evangelists in a great measure supersede this, I could only bring in a part of that clause here; though in the whole of this work I am as careful as possible to omit no one circumstance that any of the sacred writers mention.
branches from off the trees, and strewed them in the way. [Mat. xxi. 8, Luke xix. 36. John xii. 14.—]

5 Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold, thy king cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting on a donkey, and a colt the foal of a donkey. [Matt. xxi. 4.]

Now all this was done, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, the prophet saith, [as it is written, Zech. ix. 9], “Say ye to the daughter of Sion, behold, king cometh unto thee, meek, and mighty upon earth; and fear not any of thine enemies: for behold, with pleasing amazement, thy King, the great expected Messiah, cometh unto thee, meek, and having salvation; and, in token of the gentleness of his administration, and his strict observance of the Divine law, he shall make his public entrance into thy city, not as other princes affect to appear, in a proud triumphal chariot, or riding on a stately managed horse, decked with a variety of splendid ornaments, and attended with a pompous cavalcade; but he shall appear like one of thine ancient patriarchs.

It might be literally accomplished which was spoken, &c.] I shall not enter on a particular detail of the reasons which induce me to believe that the prophecy of Zechariah is here quoted according to its primary and literal sense; but content myself with referring the reader to Bishop Chandler's Defence of Christianity, p. 102—107, and Mr. Bullock's Vindication, p. 175, 176.

His strict observance of the Divine law.] The learned and ingenious Bishop Sherlock has set this fact in a most just and beautiful light, in his Fourth Dissertation annexed to the last edition of his Discourse on Prophecy. God, that he might keep the people of Israel in a more sensible dependence on himself, forbade the use of that strong, generous, and majestic animal the horse (Job xxxix. 19—25) in their armies, as also of chariots, Deut. xviii. 16. (Compare Josh. xi. 6. Judges v. 15.) David therefore, who rode himself on a mule, and ordered Solomon to do so on his coronation-day (1 Kings i. 33, 34,) burnt the chariots he took from the enemies, and hamstrung their horses, to make them unfit for war. (2 Sam. viii. 4.) And afterwards, when Solomon (1 Kings iv. 26.) and succeeding princes multiplied horses, they were rebuked by the prophets, and chastised by God for it. (See Isa. ii. 6, 7. xxxi. 1. and Hos. xiv. 3.) And the removal of them is spoken of as matter of promise in the days of the Messiah, Hos. i. 7. Mic. v. 10, 11. and Zech. ix. 10.—It is therefore with great propriety that Christ in his most public triumph choose, according to the prophecy before us, to ride on an ass.—Nor are we to imagine there was any thing mean and ridiculous in it; for the eastern asses are a much larger and more beautiful animal than ours; and it plainly appears the patriarchs and judges of the Jewish nation thought it no disgrace to ride upon them; of which Abra- ham (Gen. xxii. 3) Moses (Exod. iv. 20,) and Jair's family (Judges x. 4.) are instances. Nay, magistrates are spoken of by the general description of those that ride on white asses. Judges v. 10. (Compare Numb. xxii. 21. 2 Sam. xvi. 2. xvii. 23. xix. 26.) So that all the ridicule which has fallen on this passage must, to speak with all possible charity, be retorted on the ignorance of those who have taken upon them to censure what they did not understand.
riarchs or judges, in the earliest and best ages of thy commonwealth, sitting upon an ass; yea, he shall come upon a colt, the foal of an ass, which though it had never been backed before, shall in his miraculous hands be tractable and gentle."

Now it is to be observed that his apostles and other disciples did not understand these things at first, nor recollect the correspondence between the preceding prophecy and the event: but when Jesus was raised from the dead, and glorified at the right-hand of the Father, from whence he sent down his Spirit to instruct them in the mysteries of his word and kingdom, then they remembered that these things were written concerning him as the Messiah; and [that] they had done these things unto him, without any designed reference to the prophecy, which at the time of its accomplishment they did not so much as think of.

And when he was come nigh to the city, [and was] now at the lower part of the descent of the mount of Olives, which lay, as was said before, to the east of Jerusalem, and was but a few furlongs from it, A great multitude of people, who were come from Galilee and other parts to celebrate the feast of the passover, having heard, by some who had run before the rest of the company, that Jesus was coming in this solemn pomp to Jerusalem, immediately resolved to go and usher him with all possible respect: And accordingly they took branches of palm-trees, which were commonly carried before those who rode in public triumph, and went forth to meet him, and cried, Hosannah! May God save and prosper him!

Blessed [be] the King of Israel, who comes in the name, and by the authority, of the Lord our God, to redeem us, and to rule over us. (Compare Psal. cxviii. 25, 26.)

Now as he rode along in all this pomp, the people who were with him \(^{1}\) when he called Lazarus out of his grave, and by that almighty voice raised him from the dead, among whom he had

\(^{1}\) Hosannah! May God save and prosper him! I suppose few readers need to be informed that the Hebrew word Hosannah, signifies Save, we beseech thee.

\(^{2}\) Now the people who were with him. It is impossible that their not understanding the prophecy of Zechariah now, or recollecting it afterwards (which are the things mentioned in the preceding verse, John xii. 16.) should be the reason of what follows here. It appears then from hence (and it is very material to observe it,) that or [therefore] is sometimes used in a looser sense, so as to answer to [and or [now]], in our language.
And cry, Hosannah to the Son of David.

had lain part of four days, testified [it] to the strangers who were come up out of the country, and told them what a glorious miracle they had been eye-witnesses to. [And] for this cause, among others, and indeed with a peculiar regard to this, the people also met him from the city in the manner which has been described above; because they heard that he had done this astonishing miracle, which, in some circumstances, exceeded any which he had wrought before.

And the whole multitude of the disciples that had attended him from Bethany, both they that went before him, and they that followed after, in his triumphant procession, began greatly to rejoice, and to praise God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works and glorious miracles which they had seen performed by him on a great variety of occasions, and which they now particularly called to mind. [And] as they now were met by a vast concourse of people from Jerusalem, they joined together in their triumphs and congratulations; and cried with all their might, saying, Hosannah to the great illustrious Son of David, who now vouchsafes to make his public appearance among us; blessed be he, [even] the long-expected King and Sovereign of God's people, who now comes to us in the name of the Lord! May the most exalted honours be paid him! May continued prosperity attend him! Let there be peace in heaven, and a rich variety of Divine favours be dispensed from thence; and, in return for them, let glory be given to God in the most exalted strains, and let all the highest orders of angels join in his praises! Blessed and prosperous be the sacred kingdom of our father David! May it speedily be established, and may it long flourish; even that kingdom which is not gained by the alarms of war and garments rolled in blood, but which comes in the name of the Lord, and renders itself, by that powerful influence on men's spirits which we now feel, victorious over whatsoever would oppose it! Hosannah therefore in the highest strains! Repeat again and again your songs and your congratulations." Thus they expressed their joyful and rapturous expectations of his assuming the royal dignity, and vindicating Israel from the Roman oppression; and, emboldened by the display of his power in the resurrection of Lazarus, they feared not the re-sentiment of their present masters for declaring themselves thus openly in his favour.

And some of the proud and envious Pharisees who were among the multitude as spies rather than friends, were much offended at the high honours that were paid to Jesus, and maliciously said to him, with an intent to embarrass and expose him, Master, canst thou be pleased with all this noise? or can it be consistent with thy great humility to suffer it? Why dost thou not rebuke thy disciples for such dangerous acclamations as these? Dost thou intend to give encouragement to such seditious speeches, and to stand by the consequences which may follow them?

And Jesus, who was now determined to lay aside that reserve which for wise reasons he had formerly used, answered and said unto them, I tell you, that the reason for these acclamations is so plain, and the evidences of it so strong that it must be great stupidity not to see, and great obstinacy not to own it: so that if these should be silent, one might almost expect that the very stones should immediately cry out, to proclaim my kingdom: yea, God would even animate the stones on such an occasion, rather than he would suffer me to want this triumph, so evidently marked out by his prophets.

The Pharisees then, turning from him with envy and rage, said to each other, Perceive ye not that you gain no manner of advantage by all your consultations, and the decrees of your sanhedrin? Behold, the whole world is gone after him, till he has now thrown off the mask, and taken upon him to declare his pretences; which, if the people thus fall in with them, must necessarily end in our ruin, and perhaps in that of the whole nation.

Improvement.

Let us behold this meek triumph of the great Redeemer with pleasure! He entered the capital of his kingdom riding upon an ass; a circumstance in which he made, though by no means a ridiculous, yet to be sure a very humble figure: yea, he appeared exactly as the prophet described him, upon a colt the foal of an ass; not yet grown up to its best form, nor adorned with any sumptuous or elegant furniture, but only covered with the mantles of his poor attendants, and perhaps with nothing better for for a bridle than a cord, which might have tied the foal at the door.

Let us imagine that we saw the Son of God, and the King of Israel, thus proceeding towards Jerusalem, and the people meeting him, and surrounding him with their acclamations: Hosannah! Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord! Do not our hearts spring at the sound? Do we not, as it were in spirit, go forth with them, and join in their sublime, though simple song? Thus let us welcome him into our hearts! Let us echo it back! Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord, with Divine authority, and Divine blessings in his hands! And blessed be the kingdom he hath erected! May perpetual prosperity attend it! May the north give up a swarm of subjects to it; and may not the south keep back her swarthy sons! May nations be born at once, and thousands together made willing in the day of his power! Surely if these are not our affectionate wishes, the warm and zealous sentiments of our very hearts, it may almost be expected that the very stones should cry out, to accuse and condemn our ungrateful stupidity.

Unhappy Pharisees, who looked on these triumphs with envy and rage, and grieved that the world was gone after him! Yet less unhappy had they not renewed their attempts against him, those fatal attempts which ended in their ruin! But who, that had seen the procession, and heard the shouts of the transported multitude, could have imagined or believed, that before the end of the week they should have turned their voices against him, and instead of Hosannah, should have cried out, Crucify him? Yet so it was, and Christ knew it would be so. Such is the uncertainty of popular applause! Who would then purchase it at the expense of his conscience, or even of his ease?

These transports were raised by the hopes of a temporal kingdom; and when those hopes were disappointed, these transports were turned into rage. Oh that there may be none, under all the engagements of a Christian, and even of a ministerial profession, who proclaim Christ with great appearances of zeal, only that they may exalt themselves; and wish prosperity to his kingdom, only as it may promote their own interest in a world from which it was the great design of his death to redeem his servants.

Oh that at length, though with the greatest obstinacy thou liest despised the messages of all thy prophets, thou hadst but known and seriously regarded, at least in this thy latest day and opportunity of grace, the important things which belong to thy peace, and on which thy final happiness depends! a That thou hadst known.] It is certain (as we have observed elsewhere, note a, on Luke xii. 50. Vol. I. p. 356) that the particle a is sometimes used to express an ardent wish (compare Num. xxxii. 29, and Josh. vii. 7, Septuag.) and the connection here will very well bear it. If our translation be retained, it must be acknowledged that the broken manner of speaking is very emphatical: our Lord will then seem to pause in a silent reflection on the happy consequences that would have attended their obedient regard to his invitations and addresses,—but to add the words [it had been well], which some have proposed, would rather enervate than help the sense; as I think it would do in most of the passages which learned critics have produced from the Greek writers as instances of a like figure of speech. See Mr. Hallett on Script. Vol I. p. 11.

b Thine enemies shall—compass the round, &c.] Josephus says expressly, that though it was thought a great and almost impracticable work to encompass the city with a wall, yet Titus animating his soldiers to attempt it, they in three days surrounded it with a wall of thirty-nine furlongs in circumference, with thirteen castles in its circuit; and by this means all hope was cut off that any of the Jews within the city should escape. (Bell. Jud. lib. v. cap. 12. [al. 15, § 1, 2.]—He also tells us, that when Titus had taken the city, and contrary to his will the temple was consumed with fire, he caused the foundations both of the temple and the city to be dug up and levelled with the ground, leaving only three towers and part of the wall to be a specimen of its former strength and grandeur; (Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap 1 [al. 18]. § 1.) And afterwards the whole was so entirely destroyed that not one stone was left upon another; as Socrates relates, Hist. Eccl. liii. cap. 20.—In short, the accomplishment of every part of this prediction is recorded by Josephus in so affecting and particular a manner, especially in the Sixth Book of his Jewish War, that I cannot but recommend the perusal of it to every Christian who has an opportunity of reading it.
under thy ruins; and shall not leave so much as one stone upon another in thee of all thy splendid and sacred structures: and all these terrible calamities shall overwhelm thee, because thou didst not know and consider the appointed season of thy merciful visitation, nor attend to those overtures of grace which I have so often made in person to thee, and have still urged with so much seriousness and tenderness.

And Jesus entered into Jerusalem with great solemnity, amidst the joyful acclamations of the people; and as he made his entrance in such a public and remarkable way, the whole city was in a great commotion at so uncommon an appearance, saying, Who is this that comes in all this pomp, and is attended with these high congratulations? And the multitude that came with him said, This is Jesus the great Prophet, who is of Nazareth in Galilee, even he that is so celebrated all over the country for the fame of his doctrine and miracles.

And Jesus having come into the city by the eastern gate, alighted from the colt, and went directly into the temple of God, whither the people followed him: and when he had looked round about, and made his observation upon all things there, as he perceived those profanations were again renewed which he had formerly so solemnly chastised soon after he entered on his public ministry, he began with a holy indignation to animadvert upon them, as he had done three years before, and to drive out all them that sold...
sold and bought in the outer-court of the temple, which was appointed for the Gentile proselytes to worship in, but was made use of by the Jews as if it were a common market-place; and with an irresistible authority he overthrew the tables of the exchangers of foreign money into the current coin, which those that came from distant parts might want to offer for the service of the sanctuary (see Exod. xxx. 13, 14.) and likewise overthrew the seats of them that sold doves for sacrifices. And he said to them as he turned them out, Such practices as these profane the house of God, and shamefully pervert the use for which it was designed; for it is written (Isa. lvi. 7.) My house shall be called an house of prayer for all people, to which they shall resort for the performance of religious worship: but you have turned it into a house of merchandise, and made it (as the prophet speaks, Jer. vii. 11.) a den of robbers, a place where traffic is carried on by persons of the most infamous character, who live by deceit and oppression, and practise the vilest extortion, even in the house of the righteous and blessed God. (Compare John ii. 14—16, sect. xxi. and Mark xi. 15, 17, sect. cl.)

And there were many of the blind and lame, who had no sooner heard of his arrival in the city but they immediately desired to be led to the place where he was; and they came to him in the temple, and he graciously healed them in the presence of all the people.

But when the chief priests and scribes beheld the wonders he performed, and observed how the very children were crying out in the temple, and continued the song which the multitude had begun, saying, "Hosannah to the Son of David! with joyful acclamations we congratulate his coming, and bid him welcome into the city of his royal father!" instead of being open to conviction,

13 And said unto them, It is written, My house [is, and] shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves. [Luke xix. 46]

14 And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple, and he healed them.

15 And when the chief priests and scribes saw the wonderful things that he did, and the children crying in the temple, and saying, Hosanna to the Son of David; they were sore displeased, c A den of robbers.] Bishop Smallbrook well observes (in his Answer to Woolston, Vol. I. p. 168.) that our Lord in this expression seems to allude to the custom which robbers in those parts had of sheltering themselves in dens and caves in the wilderness, where great multitudes of them often joined in sharing their plunder.

† The blind and lame.] Many such would, no doubt, be waiting in the several avenues of the temple, to ask alms at a time when there would be such a vast concourse of people; and there seems a peculiar propriety in our Lord's multiplying these astonishing miracles, both to vindicate the extraordinary act of authority he had just been performing, and to make this his last visit to Jerusalem as convincing as possible, that those who would not submit to him might be left so much the more inexcusable.

Out
He vindicates the children in their hosannas.

16 And said unto him, Hearest thou what these say? And Jesus saith unto them, Yea; have ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise?

And thus he was till the time of the passover, which was celebrated within five days after this, teaching daily in the temple: but the chief priests, and the scribes, and others of the rulers of the people, who had before decreed his death, according to the resolution which the sanhedrim had come to by the advice of Caiaphas (John xi. 53, sect. cxli.) were still contriving how they might execute their horrid design, and diligently sought an opportunity to destroy him: But they knew not how to effect it, and could not immediately find out what they might do for that purpose, or what safe method they might take to seize him; for all the common people listened to him with so great attention and pleasure.

OUT OF THE MOUTH OF BABES, &c.] To ordain strength, which is the phrase the Psalmist uses in the passage here referred to, was in effect (as the seventy render it) to perfect praise; so that there is no need to be solicitous about that little variation in the quotation.—This general observation of David was greatly illustrated by the Hosannas of these children; and yet much more by the triumph of the apostles, weak as in many respects they were, over all the opposition of Jews and Gentiles.

CELEBRATED WITHIN FIVE DAYS AFTER THIS.] This was the first day of the week, or our Lord's-day; in commemoration of which Palm-sunday, was long ago denominated, and as ceremonies increased was particularly observed. The passover was celebrated by Christ on the Thursday night following, and he was crucified on Friday. Some transactions of each intervening day are marked in the following history.
Reflections on Christ's weeping over Jerusalem, &c.

SECT. cxlvii.

Sure, that they hung as it were on his lips while he spake, and pressed upon each other for an opportunity of hearing him. The magistrates therefore feared lest the populace should tumultuously rise in his defence, if they offered any public violence to him, and that thus they might endanger themselves while they sought to destroy Jesus.

IMPROVEMENT.

Luke XIX. 41. Next to the sight of a bleating and dying Redeemer there can surely be none in the whole world more affecting than this which is here represented; even 'the Son of God weeping over perishing sinners; yea, over the sinners of Jerusalem. We might, perhaps, have been ready to think that, foreseeing so circumstantially, as we know he did, all the ungrateful and inhuman treatment he was to meet with in this nest of murderers, with the scene of his sufferings, and the very house of Caiaphas in his full view, he should rather have taken up a proverb against it, and have anticipated the triumphs of that awful day when God would plead his cause with irresistible terror, and avenge the quarrel of his sacred blood. But behold, he seems to forget himself, and all his wrongs, great and cruel as they were; and in the midst of a procession intended for his honour, he melts into tears, as if it were for the calamity of a friend, or a brother; and says in the most genuine language of undissembled grief, Oh that thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace!

Behold, O our souls, with wonder and with awe, at once the goodness and severity of God: (Rom. xi. 22.) The sinners of Jerusalem wept over, and yet abandoned to ruin! We have our part in all this: the tidings of the gospel are the things which belong to our peace, the things on which our everlasting happiness depends. Let us remember that the time will come in which, if we do not attend to them, they will be hid from our eyes. There is a limited day of mercy and grace; and therefore to-day, while it is called to-day, let us hear his voice, and not harden our hearts (Heb. iii. 15.) lest slighted mercy at length retire, and vengeance take 1 They hung as it were on his lips while he spake. This is the literal import of συνεμπήθη απὶ τῇ γλώσσῃ. To render it, (as in a late version.) The populace were strongly attached to his doctrine, is far from expressing the full sense.

2 House of Caiaphas in his full view.] If we may credit the best accounts of Jerusalem which remain, this was exactly the case.—I cannot forbear referring my reader to Mr. Howe's excellent treatise, entitled, The Redeemer's Tears wept over lost Souls; in which, as in most of his practical works, there are such sublime and pathetic strokes of true, manly, and Christian eloquence, as do a great honour to the language and age in which they were written.
take its turn; a vengeance which will fall the heavier, and pierce the deeper, in proportion to all the long-suffering and goodness which have been exercised towards us in vain. Let all, and especially the ministers of Christ, learn compassion to souls by such an example; and when the strongest efforts of love prove ineffectual for their recovery, let us at least be mourning for them before the Lord, and weeping over the ruin which we cannot prevent.

Though Christ had cleared the temple from the profanations of these traders at the beginning of his ministry, he found the same pollutions returned at the close of it. And, alas, how often do we find it thus with respect to our hearts! How soon do those weeds spring up again which we had been endeavouring with a resolute hand to root up; and how often are efforts for reformation forgotten, even when the attempt appeared at first to be most necessary! Let us learn of Christ not to be weary of well-doing, but with continued zeal renew our endeavours again and again.

The scribes and Pharisees envied Christ; but the children sur-round him with their Hosannas; and he graciously accepts their feeble accents of praise, as ordained by God out of the mouth of babes and sucklings. Nor will he now despise the day of small things. Oh that we might have the pleasure to see little children pronouncing the name of Christ with reverence and love! And surely we who are parents must add, with a peculiar accent, Oh that our own may join in the choir! May they learn the song from our lips: and may our whole lives be one continued visible proof of the devotion and affection with which we present it! Amen.

SECT. CXLVIII.

Some Greeks that came to celebrate the passover at Jerusalem are introduced to Christ, who enters on an excellent discourse particularly suited to their circumstances; and retires in the evening to Bethany. John XII. 20—36. Mat. XXI. 17. Mark XI.—11.

John XII. 20.

And there were certain Greeks among them that came up to worship at the feast:

21 The same came there-

*Some Greeks—who had devoted themselves to the God of Israel.] It is strange that such learned critics as Isaac Vossius and Salmusius should imagine these worshippers to have been idolatrous Gentiles. Dr. Whitby, and several other consider-

Some Greeks desire to see Jesus.

Philip, who was of Bethsaida, a city of Galilee, and asked it as a favour of him to introduce them to his Master, saying, in a very respectful manner, Sir, we earnestly desire to see and hear this Jesus of Nazareth, of whom we have been told such extraordinary things, and who has now been received into the city with such unusual regard.

Upon this Philip comes and tells what their request was to Andrew, who likewise was of Bethsaida, and had been first acquainted with Christ (John i. 40, 44, sect. xxi. xxii.) and then, Andrew and Philip, having agreed upon it, went and told Jesus that some Greeks who were come to the feast desired admittance to him.

And Jesus immediately ordered them to be brought to him; and as they were approaching him, he answered them saying, At length the hour is come, and the appointed time is just at hand, that the Son of man must be glorified; and I would have you look on the approach of these Greeks as an earnest of the flowing in of all the nations to me. But wonder not if my death is to precede it; for verily, verily, I say unto you, and assure you of it as a most solemn and important truth, That unless a grain of wheat fall to the ground, and die and waste away there, it remains single and alone, but if it seem to die and wither after it is sown, such is the principle of vegetation which it contains, that a new production able writers, have indeed thought that they were such as are commonly called proselytes of the gate, that is (as most readers well know), persons who, having renounced idolatry, and being worshippers of the God of Israel, might, according to the law of Moses, be permitted to dwell in Judea, and to converse among the Jews, though not with entire freedom. And it has likewise been thought, that the regard which Jesus shewed to such, in vindicating the Court of the Gentiles, (where they assembled for religious worship) from the contemptuous profanations of the Jews, (Matt. xxvi. 12, 13. p. 164.) might dispose these pious persons to address themselves to him. But their attending at the passover leads me rather to imagine (with Arndus, Macel. Sac. p. 6.) that they were what the rabbinists now call proselytes of righteousness, that is such as by circumcision obliged themselves to observe the whole law: (compare Acts ii. 5. viii. 27. xiii. 45.) Yet I will not venture confidently to affirm it.

b Bethsaida of Galilee.] This town lay on the borders of Syrophoenicia, from whence (as Grotius thinks) these Greeks might come; so that they might, perhaps, be acquainted with Philip as a neighbour; or otherwise we cannot say why this circumstance relating to him is here mentioned.—The learned Reland argues, that there were two Bethsai'da's, of which this lay most to the north. See Reland, Palest. p. 653.

c Jesus answered them, saying.] The phrase here intimates the suitableness of the following discourse to this particular occasion, by attending to which many of the beauties of it will be discovered. Our Lord might, perhaps, enlarge on some of these hints; and if his hearers took a due notice of them, and made a proper report on their return home, it might prepare the way for the apostles, when they came by their preaching more fully to unfold and illustrate these important doctrines.

but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.

35 He that loveth his life, shall lose it: and he that hateth his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal.

26 If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be: if any man serve me, him will my Father honour.

27 Now is my soul troubled: and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour:

Duction of the like kind arises, and it brings forth much fruit. And so it is that I myself shall fall, and a new scene be opened, in which my kingdom shall seem to be utterly lost and gone; yet, like the spring corn, it shall assuredly revive, and appear beautiful and fruitful.

But, in the mean time, such difficulties are also to be expected by my faithful servants, that it is but fit I should Inform these strangers of what I have once and again told you; that he who loves his own life too well to part with it for my sake, shall lose it, and expose himself to death in the worst and most dreadful sense of the word; but he that acts as if he hates his life in this world, by exposing it to the greatest dangers in the cause of my gospel, shall preserve it even to everlasting life, and secure a state of immortal glory and happiness. (Compare Mat. x. 39, sect. lxxvi. Mark viii. 35, sect. lxxxix. and Luke xvii. 33, sect. cxxviii.) If any man therefore would engage to serve me as one of my loyal people, let him resolve to follow me whithersoever I shall lead him, whatever dangers and difficulties may lie in the way; and let him know, for his encouragement, that where I am, or where I shortly am to take up mine abode, there shall also my faithful servant be; for I will assign him an inheritance in that blessed world where I am for ever to rest and reign after all the sufferings I have endured here: and I assure you that, among all that follow me, if any man, of whatever nation he be, or whatever his religious profession may before have been, will faithfully serve me here, him will [my] Father also honour, and confer such rich rewards upon him as to make him for ever both great and happy.

Having said this, our Lord paused for a while, and entered on a deep contemplation of the very different views of things which lay before him. And then he added aloud, Now is my very soul distressed and troubled in an affecting view of my approaching sufferings; and what shall I say? What petition shall I offer to God on this occasion? Shall I say, Father, save me from this this dreadful hour, and from all the agonies which I am to endure in the gloomy season before me? Nay, but for this cause was I born into the world, and for this end I came even to this present hour, that I might bear the sufferings on which I am entering, and might redeem my people by them. And far be it from me to draw back from such engagements and undertakings: I will therefore much rather say, Father, glorify thine own name, and dispose of me, and all my concerns, in such a way as may most effectually answer that great end!

Then, at that very instant while he was speaking, there came a voice from heaven [which said], I have both already glorified [it] by the whole of thy ministry thus far; and I will glorify [it] yet again in a more signal manner by what farther remains before thee.

The multitude therefore who stood by and heard [it], though not all in a manner equally distinct, were perfectly astonished at the awful sound; and some among them said, That it thundered! while others, who were nearer, said, That an angel spake to him from heaven.

But Jesus answered and said to his disciples who stood near, and distinctly heard it, This voice from heaven came not chiefly for my sake, who was before assured of the affection of my Father, and knew the purpose he had formed to glorify himself by me; but it was uttered for yours, that you may not be offended at the treatment I shall meet with, and quit your hope in me, and regard for me, on account of any of the sufferings which are coming upon me. This indeed is a very critical and important time; for but for this cause came I unto this hour.

Father, glorify thy name.—

—Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again.

The people therefore that stood by, and heard it, said, That it thundered! others said, An angel spake to him.

Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes.

Now is the judgment.

What shall I say? Father, save me from this hour?] I suppose few need be told that the pointing of the New Testament is far less ancient than the text. It is agreeable to observe how many difficulties may be removed by varying it, and departing from the common punctuation of which I take this to be one of the most remarkable instances. For as the text does not oblige us to it, it does not seem natural to suppose that our Lord actually offered this petition, and then immediately retract it again.

Thad that it thundered.] Thunder often attended a voice from heaven; [see Evod. xix. 16, 19, Rev. iv. 5. vi. 1. x. 3.] In allusion to which, perhaps, the voice itself was called by the ancient Jews Bat Kol, or the daughter of the voice, being ushered in with thunder, and, as it were, produced from it. Eisner has shown that the Heathens reckoned that sudden thunder was a sign that a prayer then offered met with the most favourable regard. See Eisner, Obscr. Vol. I. p. 334, 335.—Dr. Lightfoot observes here (Her. Heb. in loc.) that Christ had three the testimony of a voice from heaven; first, when he entered on his public ministry, as the High-priest of our profession, at his baptism (Mat. iii. 17.) and then a second time, when a command was given to hear him, as the great Prophet of the church at his transfiguration, (Mat. xviii. 5.) and now again, when he had made his public entry into Jerusalem, as a King.
When he was lifted up, he would draw all men to him.

ment of this world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out.

32 And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.

33 (This he said, signifying what death he should die.)

34 The people answered him, We have heard out of the law, that Christ abideth for ever: and sayest thou, The Son of man must he lifted up? Who is this Son of man?

Now is the judgment of this world, which I am going to conquer and condemn, that by my death my followers may both be taught and enabled to triumph over it, and those may be convinced of sin that believe not in me: (compare Gal. i.
4. and John xvi. 8, 9.) Yea, now shall Satan, the ruler and god of this world, be cast out from that empire which he has so long usurped over the minds of men, and especially over the heathen nations. (Compare Eph. ii. 2. and 2 Cor.
iv. 4.) And when I am lifted up from the earth, though I may seem thereby to be made the trophy of mine enemies, yet such shall be the effect of that important event, that I shall thereby draw all men to me; that is, I shall lay a foundation for conquering the most stubborn hearts by so rich a display of my love; and shall by a secret, but powerful influence on their minds, persuade multitudes of all ranks and all nations to list themselves under the banner I raise. (Compare John iii. 14, 15. Vol. i.
p. 147, 148.)

Now this he spake of his being lifted up from the earth, as signifying by what death he should die, even by crucifixion, in which the person suffering was lifted up on high, and hung as it were between heaven and earth. And in general it was understood by the people as implying some violent death shortly to come upon him. The multitude therefore answered him, We have heard it taught as a certain truth; out of the law, or out of the volume of our sacred writings, that the Messiah is immortal, and abides for ever, “that his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion continues unto all generations.” (2 Sam. vii. 16. Psal. lxxxix.
44. vii. 14.) and how then dost thou, who now Massey, renders this (in his Verine. Sacra.

p. 8, 9.) Now is this world come to its crisis:
and Grotrius and More (in his Theological works, p. 207.) explain it of the redemption of the world, or its vindication from the bondage of Satan. But this is so unusual a sense of the word, that I choose, with Dr. Whitby, to understand it of the condemnation of the world, or of the judgment passed upon its wicked principles and practices, and of the victory which Christians were to gain over it in consequence of the death of Christ. See John iii. 18, 19. xvi. 8, 11.

ciently vindicates this version of posal i-plainly professest thyself to be the Messiah, say that the Son of man must be lifted up from the earth, and die a violent death? Who is this Son of man? Is he, as such language as this might seem to intimate, a different person from the Messiah, whom we have been taught to expect under the title of the Son of man? This was said by some of the multitude who were ill-affect ed towards him, and desired to find something to object against him.

Then Jesus said to them, Do not cavil at what I now say; but remember how short this opportunity is, which, through the Divine goodness, you now enjoy: yet a little while is the light with you, which you may derive from me, or my servants who shall come to you in my name; walk therefore while you have the light; comply with the gracious purposes of God in making these discoveries to you, and regulate your temper and conduct by them; that darkness may not overtake you, that you may not be deprived of the gospel, and left in a night of ignorance and misery: for you know it is a most uncomfortable thing for a traveller to be benighted in his way, as he that walks in darkness wanders from place to place, and knows not whither he goes, or into what dangers he may fall the very next step he takes; and much more dreadful will it be for you to be deserted of God, and left to the darkness and folly of your own hearts. (Compare John xi. 9, 10. sect. cxxxix.) Let me therefore once more seriously and kindly exhort you, that while you have the light thus clearly shining around you, you believe in the light, and honestly follow it, that you may be the children of light, who, being now truly wise and good, shall be the heirs of holiness, glory, and joy everlasting.

These things Jesus spake when the Greeks applied themselves to him; and as the unbelieving Jews were greatly irritated by the actions and discourses of the day, and would not be awakened to conviction, he left them, and departed thence.

35 Then Jesus said unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you: walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth.

36 While ye have the light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light—

—These things spake Jesus, [and he left them,] and departed, [Mark, and now the even tide was come, [Act. x. 24, 25.].]

1 Who is this Son of man?] A writer of great note interprets this as if they had said, "Who is this that so absurdly, and inconsistently with the prophets, speaks of himself as the Son of man, while he talks of being lifted up, and dying?" (See Dr. Sykes on Christianity, p. 110.) But the sense given in the paraphrase appears to me more natural, and I am pleased to find it in Grotius. This was a real and important difficulty; but it was fit some obscurity should for the present he left upon it, lest the plainness of the prediction should have prevented its accomplishment. Our Lord therefore gave the discourse a useful turn, and a few days more proclaimed the mystery which he had before revealed to his apostles in private when he set out on his last journey to Jerusalem. (See Matt. xx. 18, 19. sect. cxlii.)

late in the evening, he privately went out of the city to Bethany, with none to attend him but the twelve apostles; and, knowing that his eneemies were watching to destroy him, and might have attempted to seize him by night if he had tarried at Jerusalem, he lodged there at Bethany, and concealed himself from them, to avoid the assaults of their deliberate malice till his hour was come.

IMPROVEMENT.

Who can wonder at the desire these Greeks expressed to see so Ver.
celebrated a Person as Jesus was! We hope there was something more than mere curiosity in it, and that at length they saw him with believing eyes, and, according to his prediction, glorified him by a cordial acceptance of his gospel.—His disciples, we see were ready to introduce them: and surely every faithful minister of Christ will undertake the task with pleasure when he sees souls awakened by Divine grace, and inquiring after Jesus with affectionate concern.

Blessed be God, it has already, in many instances, been seen that by the death of Christ an immortal seed was sown, which has multiplied in all ages, and is still multiplying: Oh that it might have greater increase! One would think that words so gracious as these should promote that increase, and operate upon every heart to produce a love to him sufficient to conquer every danger and opposition which may be met with in his cause: behold the promise which he has left upon record; “If any man, be he ever so mean and unworthy, will but faithfully serve and follow me, whatever his former wanderings and rebellions may have been, where I am, there shall also my servant be.” Happy state indeed! not only, like these Greeks, to have a transient sight of Christ, but to be for ever with him!

How admirable is the love and stedfastness of our Redeemer, who procured so great a happiness for us at so dear an expence!
and even when his innocent soul was troubled in the view of his sufferings, instead of declining them, met them with joy! How should it animate us to renew that general comprehensive petition, than which none can be more suitable to us with regard to all the divine dispensations; Father, glorify thine own name! Glorify thyself, O Lord! and to that great end dispose of us as thou pleasest; for we should abhor ourselves if we had any interest separate from thine!

We may be assured, as certainly as by a voice from heaven, that this

this great end shall be answered: and in this we should rejoice.
Behold, the prince of this world is cast out! Behold, Satan is vanquished by Christ! and Jesus lifted up on the cross for a standard to all the nations. Behold the attractive magnet by which all men are to be drawn, by which all his chosen people shall be brought to him, and so raised up to heaven itself! Let us look unto him from the ends of the earth, and labour with our cold hearts to awaken them to that lively and ardent affection which we owe to him who was crucified for us.

35, 36 For ever adored be Divine grace for this gospel light which discovers to us so excellent an object! May we use it to saving purposes, and so walk in it, as that we may appear to be the children of light! Let us think of that last distribution of mankind, when the children and heirs of light and darkness are once for all to be separated. Let us think of the gloom of eternal night, which will shortly overtake those by whom the gospel is now despised; and remember how much it will be aggravated by the light we have so long seen. Do thou, O God, at whose word light arose out of darkness, send forth by thine influences on our hearts thy light and thy truth, that they may lead and bring us to thine holy hill, (Psal.
xliii. 3.) and that we may have the satisfaction of knowing whither we go, even when we walk through the dark valley of the shadow of death. (Psal. xxiii. 4.)

SECT. CXLIX.

John's reflections on the infidelity of the Jews. As Christ was returning the next morning to Jerusalem, he curses the barren fig-

John XII. 37.

NOW such was the perverseness of the Jews and useth the prejudice they had conceived against our Lord, that though he had sufficiently declared himself to be the true Messiah, and though he had done so many undeniable and glorious miracles at this and other times before them, in their most public places and most numerous assemblies, yet the greater part of them were hardened in their infidelity, and, notwithstanding all that he had said and done, they were in general so obstinate, that they did not believe on him as the Messiah. So that the saying of Isaiah the prophet was plainly fulfilled and verimight be fulfilled which he spake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?

39 Therefore they could not believe because that Esaias said again, 40 He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart, that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart; and be converted, and I should heal them.

41 These things said Esaias

So that the saying of Isaiah was fulfilled.] It is apparent (as the late judicious Mr. Jeffrey has observed in his True Grounds, &c. p 110) that the accomplishment of this prophecy could not be the end they proposed to themselves in their unbelief; and consequently that the expression no xalpemyov must be rendered as it is here: which may be applied to several other passages: and shows, by the way, how precarious that remark of Mr. Pierce is by which he would make that phrase an argument, that the scripture introduced by it is quoted, not in any instance by way of accommodation, but always according to its original design and literal meaning.

b Halh the arm of the Lord been reveal.
ed.] I apprehend this phrase may allude to the habit generally worn by the easterns, and especially by persons of rank, which was a long robe without sleeves; so that when the arm was stretched out to perform any action which required strength, it would appear uncovered. (Compare Isa. lii. 10.) In this connection it seems strongly to imply, that whenever true faith is produced in the mind, it is to be considered as the effect of a Divine energy. See Eph. i. 19. and Col. ii. 12.

c He has blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart.] As God is said to harden the heart of Pharaoh in one place, while in another it is said he hardened his own heart (Exod. ix. 12. and viii. 15, 22); and as we ought to be very tender of ascribing to God any thing that looks like a necessitating influence to impel men to sin, I apprehend that all we are here to understand by God's blinding and hardening these Jews is, that he permitted them to grow more and more prejudiced against the gospel, and, for wise reasons, acted in such a manner as he knew would in fact be abused by them to an increase of those prejudices. The learned, by consulting the originals of the places below, may see instances of a phraseology nearly resembling and illustrating this. Compare Lev. xiii. 3. Ezek. xiii. 19, 22. xiv. 9. xx. 25. Gen. xli. 13. Jer. i. 10. iv. 20. and Acts x. 15, where a person is said to do what he permits, or what he declares or foretells. — The evangelist in this quotation has not confined himself exactly to the words of the prophet but the sense is plainly the same; and nothing was more usual with the Jews than to quote scripture in this way. See Sura humina, de Formulis allegantii, p. 367.

When he saw his glory.] These words seem so plainly to refer to Christ, that I cannot but approve the argument which the learned even the glory of Christ, who was then the Medium of the Divine manifestation, and spake of him and of his times in the awful words mentioned above, which had their terrible accomplishment in the men of this generation.

42 Nevertheless, at this very time there were many even of the rulers themselves who were inwardly convinced that he was the Messiah, and believed on him as such, still expecting that he would by some surprising providence be raised to the throne of Israel; but they did not think it convenient as yet to confess the convictions of their own hearts concerning [him,] on account of the declared enmity of the Pharisees against him, lest by them they should be cast out of the synagogue, and be exposed to the great ignominy and secular detriment which necessarily attended such a sentence. For they were such thoughtless and mean-spirited creatures, that they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God; and durst not face the contempt of their fellow-mortals, even to secure the approbation of their Maker. (Compare John v. 44. Vol. I. p. 265.) This was the state of things at Jerusalem, and this the effect of Christ's entrance into it, as related above.

But though the malice of his enemies was known to Jesus, and he was sensible they were contriving to destroy him, yet on the morrow-morning he again set out with his disciples for Jerusalem: and when they were come from Bethany, as he returned into the city, he was very hungry; having come out early without eating, that he might neither incommode his friends, nor break in upon his secret or public devotions.

And

learned Bishop Pearson draws from Isa. vi. 1. to prove that Christ was the Jehovah that spoke to the prophet. (Pearson on the Creed, p. 125.) Dr. Clarke indeed explains it of seeing the Father's glory: (Script. Doct. of the Trin. p. 58.) But it is difficult to say on that supposition what the evangelist intended by adding that clause [and spake of him]; and it would be quite unexampled to suppose that wou has two such different significations in the same line as that the meaning should be, he saw the Father's glory, and spake of the Son. See Vitringa on Isa. vi. 1. p. 149, & seq. He might neither incommode his friends, nor break in upon his devotion.] This must certainly have been the reason of our Lord's hunger; for none can imagine that the hospitable and most sensibly obliged family of Lazarus would otherwise have suffered Jesus to come out without eating; or that if he had eaten that morning he would have been so hungry, before he had walked two miles, as to go out of the way to gather figs. To me there appears an inexpressible charm in this oblique hint; it shews how little the evangelists were inclined to enter into panegyrics or reflections on the excellent character of their Master; and is a specimen of that simplicity and modesty which might, independent of other arguments, almost compel the assent of persons of a like temper to the wonderful story which they relate in so genuine and unaffected a manner.

42 Nevertheless, among the chief rulers also, many believed on him: but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue.

43 For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God.
And as he was now on the way, seeing a single fig-tree at a considerable distance, which had a fine spread of leaves upon it, and therefore appeared to be one of the earlier kind, he went up to it, [to see] if he could find anything thereof; and when he came to it, he found nothing thereon but leaves only; for there was not so much as any fruit in the bud; by which it plainly appeared that, though it looked so beautiful, it was a barren tree. Now it is to be observed that our Lord turned out of the way, because, as it was yet but early in the summer, the time of gathering figs was not [yet] come; so that this tree produced any, it might have been

15 And seeing a fig-tree [in the way] afar off, having leaves, he came [to it], if haply he might find anything thereon; and when he came to it, he found nothing [thereon] but leaves [only]; for the time of figs was not yet. Mat. xxii. 15.—] And the fig-tree opening its leaves, which every body knows do not appear till after the fruit, is spoken of as a sign of approaching summer, Mat. xxiv. 32. Our Lord therefore at this time might well expect to find fruit on this tree, since the time of gathering even these early figs was not yet come, which if it had, there would have been no room for the expectation, or the curse which followed it.—That says: etc., does not signify, as some have fancied, a kindly season for figs, but the time of gathering them in. I think the learned Bishop Kidder has abundantly proved. (See his Demonstration of the Messiah, § ii. p. 38, 39.) Compare Mat. xxi. 34. Mark xii. 2. and Numb. xiii. 23.—It is true this interpretation of the story, though incomparably easier than any other I know, will require a transposition of the clause before us, as if it had been said, He came, if haply he might find any thing thereon; for the time of figs was not yet; and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves. But no interpretation whatever can make the last clause, as we read it, a reason for what stands immediately before it, that he found no thing but leaves; for it is well known, that if our common fig-trees have no young figs on them in March or April, they can produce none that year. None can weigh another transposition of the like kind in the same evangelist, Mark xvi. 3, 4. (sect. cxiv.) both of them probably being occasioned by an accidental interleaving in the original, and a mistake of some early transcriber, who did not bring in the interleaved clause exactly in its due place. See instances of the like kind, Gen. xiii. 10. and Josh. xxii. 22.—And if with Hucbimus, Knatcbull, and Gataker, we should here read § instead of §, and render it, where he was it the season of figs, we must admit of the same transposition, and consequently should gain no advantage at all, by a version which (as all learned men know) is very harsh, and attended with an inelegance and impropriety which this would be no proper place to examine.

been expected they would be growing still upon it. And Jesus, finding it to be a barren tree, that only made a promising appearance, but had produced no fruit, said to it upon this occasion:\footnote{And Jesus said to it upon this occasion.} As thou art fruitless now, continue always so; let no man from henceforthwards ever eat fruit of thee, nor any fruit hereafter ever grow upon thee. And his disciples heard [it], and took notice of the words; and as soon as he had spoken them (though his disciples, as they were passing on, did not observe it at that time), the fig-tree immediately withered away; Christ intending by that significant action to intimate that the curse of God should thus wither and destroy the Jewish nation, which he had before compared to an unfruitful fig-tree. (See Luke xiii. 6—9. sect. cxvi. p. 9.)

IMPROVEMENT.

John xii. 57. How evidently necessary is the operation of Divine grace to conquer the prejudices of a sinful heart; since even the preaching of Christ himself, enforced by all his stupendous miracles, could not overcome those prejudices without it! And how cautious should sinners be that they do not stop their ears to the joyful sound of the gospel, and shut their eyes against its glorious light; lest God should leave them to their own delusions, and in his righteous judgment seal them up under final blindness and impenitence! Then will they never be converted and healed; but die with that poison in all the faculties of their souls, which will make them for ever restless and miserable.

42 Can we find words sufficient to express the madness of these Pharisees, who, while they were in their consciences convinced that Jesus was the Christ, would not confess that conviction, and publicly pay their homage to him, because they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God? Strange infatuation of the human mind! that it should be capable of believing there is a God, and yet of preferring the creatures before him; and should sometimes imagine the vain breath of popular applause or popular censure so considerable, as that God should be offended to please man; and all the honours and rewards of his heavenly presence lost, to secure a little regard from those who are perishing in their crimes, \footnote{And Jesus said to it upon this occasion.} and said. Compare note\footnote{A. T.} on Mat. xi. 25. Vol. I. p. 311.

Jesus comes to Jerusalem, and again purges the temple.

May none of us ever indulge such a temper, or ever rest in an empty profession; lest, being like the fig-tree before us, which had leaves, but no fruit, the curse of Christ should be pronounced upon us, which would immediately wither us amidst all our verdure! Let us remember that this was intended as one of those significant actions by which the holy messengers of God frequently intimated approaching judgments. Happy would it have been if some, instead of searching out objections against it, had seriously considered its design, and the sad aspect with which it looks on those who, like them, receive the grace of God in vain!

SECT. CL.

Christ, arriving at Jerusalem, visits the temple again; and, after a repeated effort to reform the continued abuses there, discourses with the people in a manner which further exasperates the priests; and in the evening goes out of the city. Mark XI. 15—19; John XII. 44, to the end.

MARK XI. 15.

And they came to Jerusalem: and Jesus went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money changers, and the seats of them that sold doves.

*To drive out them that sold and bought in the temple.] The time when this was done is fixed by Mark to the day after Jesus made his public entry into Jerusalem, and so (as was observed before, note, on Mat. xxi. 12, p. 163) this must have been a different fact from that related by Matthew, which he has introduced on the preceding day, before the shoutings of the children. We have supposed it, therefore, to be repeated by our Lord; for as it is improbable that he would not purge the temple on the day of his triumphant entry, when Mark expressly says that he looked round about upon all things; so it is plainly intimated here that he did it after his return from Bethany on the next day. Nor is it at all unlikely that, after Jesus was departed out of the city, there would be people enough, if it were only out of opposition to him, who would be ready to encourage the traders (some of whom might, perhaps, be new comers) to return again to their places. And Jesus therefore seems (as Mr. Whiston has observed) to have asserted the regard that was due to the temple now with more severity and exactness than he had done the day before, not suffering any one so much as to carry a vessel through the temple; which is a circumstance not mentioned either by Matthew or Luke in their account of the transactions of the preceding day. (See sect. cxlvii.)—But I see no foundation at all for Mr. Whiston's conjecture, that on the

and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and also the seats of them that sold doves: And he permitted not that any one, for the sake of shortening his way, should carry any burden or any kind of vessel through the courts of the temple; but strictly insisted on a due reverence to it, as a place that was entirely set apart to God's immediate service. And he taught them at large the evil of such practices; saying to them, Is it not written (as I observed but yesterday), “My house shall be called an house of prayer, and that not only for the Jews themselves, but (as the prophet says) for the sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord, or for those pious proselytes who from all the neighbouring nations shall resort to it?” (Isa. lvi. 6, 7.) But you have turned it to another use, and made it in effect a den of robbers, by suffering people here to carry on their trades, and to profane the place in which the Gentiles are to worship God, by scandalous extortion and unlawful gain. (Compare Mat. xxii. 12, 13, and Luke xix. 45, 46, p. 193, 164.)

And then, as considerable numbers of people were now gathered about him, Jesus cried, or proclaimed with a loud voice, saying, Be it known unto you all, that in these extraordinary steps which I take for the reformation of abuses, and the vindication of God's house, I act by his own immediate direction and authority; and he that cordially believes in me, believes not in me alone, but in him that sent me, and thereby does an honour to the Father himself. And he that sees me, and regards me with a lively faith, does also in effect see him that sent me, as the perfections of the Father are displayed in me; whereas, he that shuts his eyes against me, excludes the only means of being brought to the true knowledge of him. For, full of the inspiration of his blessed Spirit, I am come a light into the world, that every one who really believes in me, might not any longer abide in darkness, but might attain to the knowledge of all necessary truth, and the enjoyment of the most solid and excellent happiness. And if any one of you hear the former day Christ drove them out of the Jew's court and now out of that of the Gentiles; for it is no way probable that the traders were ever allowed to introduce their wares into the inner-court, for which the Jews had a peculiar reverence. See Mr. Whitson's View of the Harmony, p. 131, and Dr. Whity's note on Mark xi. 17.

16 And would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple.

17 And he taught, saying unto them, Is it not written, My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer? but ye have made it a den of thieves.

John xii. 44. Jesus cried and said, He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me.

45 And he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me.

46 I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me, should not abide in darkness.

47 And if any man hear
He that rejects his word shall be condemned.

48 He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day.

49 For I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak.

50 And I know that his commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.

...That very word shall judge him, &c.

Our Lord, by this manner of speaking, represents his word as a person that should sit in judgment upon unbelievers at the last day. (Compare Heb. iv. 13.) But I can see no ground for Mr. Fleming's interpretation (Christology, Vol. I. p. 126,) who would render it, The Logos, which I have spoken of, shall judge him; as if he had said, "Though it is not my present business to do it, yet I have a commission from my Father, which is hereafter to take place; when I shall appear worthy of that great name," I do not recollect that our Lord had given himself the title of Logos: and therefore his discourses with the Jews: and therefore can see no reason to suppose such a reference to it.

nothing in the message he has sent me to deliver. So that the doctrine which I preach should be received as coming from the Father, and by rejecting it you will be guilty of despising his authority.

Thus did our Lord continue to reform abuses, and to teach the people with the utmost seriousness and earnestness, on the second day of that week in which he suffered. And the scribes and chief priests were much offended when they heard [of it], and diligently sought how they might find out some expedient to destroy him, for they not only envied, but dreaded him, because all the people were visibly struck into attention and wonder at his doctrine, and seemed disposed to receive it with a respect proportionable to its importance and solemnity.

19 And, that he might give them no unseasonable advantages against him, when the evening was come, he went out of the city, and spent the night as he had done before, in a retired place with his disciples.

MARK XI. 18. And the scribes and chief priests heard it and sought how they might destroy him, for they feared him, because all the people was astonished at his doctrine.

19 And when even was come, he went out of the city.

IMPROVEMENT.

How hard is it to purge a carnal heart, and disentangle it from the snares of a deceitful world! No sooner were these traders driven from the temple, but they return to it again; and are as busy the next day in the pursuit of their unlawful gain as they had been before. And thus how often are convictions stifled by the love of this world! And if the voice of conscience, or the word of God, may interrupt us for a while in our unlawful courses, yet where it may affect our worldly interest, how ready are we to return to them again! and with what difficulty are we brought so far to lay aside our earthly projects, as not to take them with us into the house of God! Purge us, O Lord, from every irregular desire; pursue and perfect thine own work; and incline our hearts unto thy testimonies, and not unto covetousness! (Psal. cxix. 36.)

Most important is that proclamation which our Lord made in the temple, and is still making to us in his word: believing in him, we believe in the Father; and seeing him, we see the Father. Let us be ready therefore to receive him out of regard to his Divine authority, as well as with a view to our own happiness; for without him we can have no access unto the Father, nor can we ever see him as a reconciled God.—The sacred light which he diffuses around him is not intended merely to amuse our eyes with pleasing speculations, but to animate our hearts with holy affections, and to guide our feet into the way of peace. (Luke i. 79.) If we desire
The disciples observe that the fig-tree is withered away.

Desire therefore to escape an abode in eternal darkness, and to see light everlasting, let us faithfully follow him: otherwise we are condemned already, and that word which he spake will become to us Ver. a savour of death unto death (2 Cor. ii. 16), and will judge us in the last solemn and dreadful day, when it shall sentence those who would not be saved by it.

Let us now make that word the rule of our life which shall then be the rule of our judgment. We may most comfortably venture our eternal all on the exact veracity of it. Christ has perfectly fulfilled the commission he received from his Father, as one that was faithful to him that appointed him; and stands so completely approved in his sight, that our only hope is that we also may be accepted in him, and find mercy and grace for his sake.

SECT. CLI.

Jesus, returning to the city in the morning, his disciples observe that the fig-tree was withered away: being come into the temple, he confounds the members of the sanhedrim, who questioned his authority, and reproves them by the parable of the complaisant but disobedient son. Mat. XXI. 20—32. Mark XI. 20, to the end; XII. 1.—Luke XX. 1—9.

Mark XI. 20.

And in the morning, as they passed by, saw the fig-tree dried up from the roots, saying, How soon is the fig-tree withered away! [Mat. xxi. 20.]

21 And Peter, calling to remembrance, saith unto him, Master, behold, the fig-tree, which thou cursedst, is withered away.

Mark XI. 20.

Now Jesus, having spent the night with his disciples in a retired place without the city, returned again to Jerusalem on the third day of the week in which he suffered: and in the morning, as they were passing by the spot of ground where he had cursed the barren fig-tree on the day before, when the disciples saw the fig-tree dried up from the very roots, and so entirely stripped of its leaves that though it stood at some distance from the road, they easily discerned the change, they were greatly struck at the sight, and wondered, saying, How soon is the fig-tree that stands yonder withered away, though yesterday it seemed so flourishing! And Peter, recollecting what he had passed, took notice of it to Jesus, and said unto him, Rabbi, behold, the fig-tree which thou cursedst but yesterday, is now quite withered away.

Matthew relates this story of the fig-tree, as if the notice that the disciples took of it, and the account that Jesus gave them of the power of faith, followed immediately upon his cursing it. But Mark has so expressly referred the circumstances to the next morning, and so particularly mentions Peter's recollecting what he had passed before, that it is plain his order must be followed here, which Matthew has neglected, that he might give us the whole of the story together.
And Jesus answering, says unto them, See that you have a steadfast faith in God, and a full confidence in his power and fidelity, when you feel him secretly moving on your spirits, to stir you up to any miraculous operation. For I assuredly say unto you, That if you have such a firm and steadfast faith, and do not doubt of God's being ready to stand by you, you shall not only do such miracles as this of the fig-tree, but also shall perform far greater things; yea, whatsoever, under such an impulse, and with such a believing temper, shall attempt any thing as difficult and extraordinary, as if he were to say to this mountain which we are now crossing, Be thou removed from hence, and thrown into the distant sea; and shall not at all doubt in his mind, but steadfastly believe that what he says shall come to pass, it shall accordingly be done, [and] shall be to him just as he says. And for this reason, to encourage you boldly to act as God shall direct and instigate you, I say unto you, That whatsoever things you shall desire, [and] ask of God in prayer, to make it manifest that you are sent of him, and to confirm your doctrine; if you believe that you shall actually receive them, however difficult the things may be that you request, yet in such circumstances they shall certainly be done, and you shall have them.

But still I would subjoin one caution; that if you expect your prayers should prevail with God, you must take care to offer them in love as well as in faith; and when you stand praying, in position the apostles in such cases felt on their minds, it is impossible for any, without having experienced it, to know. It is therefore an instance of their wisdom, that they never pretend to describe it, since no words could have conveyed the idea.

And when you stand praying, there is no room to doubt that standing was their usual posture when they prayed; as Dr. Lightfoot observes with respect to the Jews (Hor. Heb. on Mat. vi. 5.) and the learned author of the Inquiry into the Worship of the Primitive Church, (chap. ii. § 1.) has shown it to be the practice of the first ages of the Christian church. (Compare Mat. vi. 5. and Luke xviii. 11.) But as the word [stand] has no particular significance here, I might have omitted it in the translation as the Prussian editors have frequently done, but that I do not choose to multiply explications in the sacred writings.

b Have faith in God, &c.] It is certain that the attempt of performing miracles in public was a remarkable instance of faith in the Divine power and fidelity; for they were generally introduced by some solemn declaration of what was intended, which was in effect a prediction of immediate success: (so Peter says, Acts iii. 6. In the name of Jesus Christ, Rise up and walk; ix. 34. Eneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole; and again, ver. 40, Tabitha, Arise.) And in pronouncing this the person speaking pawned all his credit as a messenger from God, and consequently all the honour and usefulness of his future life, on the immediate miraculous energy to attend his words, and to be visibly exerted on his uttering them. And hence it is that such a firm courageous faith is so often urged on those to whom such miraculous powers were given. But what kind of intimation of God's intended miraculous inter 27 And they come again to Jerusalem: and [when he was come into the temple,] [Luke, it came to pass, that] as he was walking, [Luke, as he taught the people, and preached the gospel,] there [Luke, came upon him] the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of [the people]; [Mat. xxii.—xxiii. 23.—Luke xx. 1.]

in the presence of that Majesty of heaven whom you have offended by so many provocations, you should forgive, if you have any matter of complaint against any; that your Father in heaven may also forgive you your trespasses. But if you do not forgive even your most cruel enemies, and much more your offending brethren, neither will your Father in heaven forgive you your trespasses: (compare Mat. vi. 14, 15. xviii. 35.) And if your trespasses be not forgiven, you have little reason to hope for such extraordinary interpositions in answer to your prayers; or if those interpositions were to be granted, you would receive no manner of advantage from them, while amidst all the glory of working the most amazing miracles you lay under the load of guilt and condemnation.

And after Jesus had been thus discoursing with his disciples by the way, they came again to Jerusalem: and when he was come into the temple, it came to pass, that as he was walking there, while he taught the people who flocked around him, and zealously preached the gospel of the kingdom to all that were desirous to be instructed in it, the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of the people, who were contriving his destruction, came upon him in a body, with a strong desire to confound and overbear him; and they spake to him in such a manner, as to express their high displeasure at what had lately passed, a It came to pass, that as he was walking.] Luke, who tells this, as he does several other stories, in a less circumstantial manner, says it was on one of those days; but the insertion of that clause here would have been improper, considering how particularly the date of this fact is fixed by Mark. If the reader should happen elsewhere to meet with the omission of a word or two in any of the evangelists (which he very seldom will), I hope he will not condemn it till he reflect whether it may not be accounted for in the same manner.

b The chief priests—and the elders of the people.] These are titles that frequently occur, but it is not easy to fix a determinate idea to them.—By the chief priests, I think we may understand any peculiar distinction in the Arianic family; so that it may include the high-priest, his deputy oragan, any of the heads of the twenty-four copies, or priests who might happen to be in waiting, and likewise any of those whom the Talmudists called Catholicin, Amaeralin and Memunnim, who (if their testimony may be credited) were appointed to preside over the other priests and Levites, and to regulate the watch, the singers, &c. A summary account of them may be seen in Reland. Antiq. Heb. part ii. cap. iii. § 4, 5.—By the elders of the people some would understand those representatives who were called Viri Stationarii, that were appointed to attend in their courses at the hours of morning and evening sacrifice in the name of the whole Israelitish nation; but I rather suppose it may signify the members of the grand sanhedrim, to whom that title most eminently and properly belonged; which is the more probable, as they were the persons under whose cognizance the late action of Christ in purging the temple would most naturally fall. These, with the persons above-mentioned, probably appeared in a considerable company on purpose to daunt him, and to bear an united testimony against him, if any thing exceptional should fall from him on this occasion.
He confounds them by asking what they thought of John.

3. And Jesus, that he might at once reprove the impropriety of the question in those circumstances, and in effect return an unexceptionable, though oblique, answer to it, said to them in reply, I will also ask of you one plain question on this occasion; and pray answer me this one thing, which if you tell me, I will likewise give you all the satisfaction you can desire, and directly tell you, if you do yet indeed need to be told, by what authority I do these things. You all remember the baptism of John, which was attended by such multitudes of people, and even by many of your leading men: (compare Mat. ii. 7, sect. xvi.) Now I would gladly know what you think of its original; From whence was it that he had his commission? was it from heaven, as he openly professed? or was it merely a contrivance of men? Answer me this, and then I will immediately resolve your question.

4. And they were perfectly confounded at so unexpected a demand, and reasoned among themselves, as it was natural to do, after this manner, saying, if we shall say, That John's baptism was from heaven, he will say to us, Why therefore did ye not believe him, and yield to his well-known and repeated testimony of me? But if we shall say, That his baptism had no Divine warrant, but was merely the device of some wicked and designing men, who by that grave solemnity endeavoured to introduce their own ambitious schemes, we have reason to fear that all the population who are here assembled will rise up and stone us; for they are all firmly persuaded that John was really a prophet sent of God; and as vast numbers of them were baptised by him, they will never bear to hear him vilified, either as an enthusiast or impostor. And therefore they declined to tell him what were their real sentiments, and answered Jesus by saying, We cannot yet certainly tell whence it was; for it is a question which still lies before the sanhedrin,

5 And [Jesus] answered and said unto them, I will also ask you [Mark, one question], and answer me; [even one thing, which if ye tell me, I likewise will tell you by what authority I do these things.] [Mat. xxi. 24. Mark xi. 29.]

6. The baptism of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men? [Mark, answer me.] [Mat. xxi. 25.—Mark xi. 30.]

7. And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say [unto us], Why then believed ye him not?[Mat. xxi. 23.—Mark xi. 31.]

8. But and if we [shall] say, Of men; [we fear] all the people will stone us; for they be [all] persuaded that John was a prophet [Mark, indeed.][Mat. xxi. 26. Mark xi. 32.]

9. And they answered [Mark, and said unto Jesus, We cannot tell] whence it was. [Mat. xxi. 27.—Mark xi. 33.]
8 And Jesus [Mark, answering,] said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. [Mark xxi. 27.—Mark xi. 35.]

Mark xii. 1.—And he began to speak unto them [and to the people] by parables, [Luke xx. 9.—]

But what think ye? A certain man had two sons, and he came to the first, and said, Son go work to-day in my vineyard.

30 And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go Sir, and went not.

1 The other question naturally requires to be determined first.] That singular turn which the reader will observe to be given to this answer of our Lord in the paraphrase by which I think the propriety of it to be much illustrated, I owe to that very accurate and learned friend who suggested the substance of note 5 on John vii. 22. Vol. I. p. 515.

2 The same answer will serve for both.] This was plainly the case; for as, on the one hand, the express testimony which John bore to Christ must be a sufficient proof of his Divine mission, if that of John was allowed (since, according to a Jewish maxim, The testimony of one prophet was sufficient to confirm the authority of another;) so Christ had spoken in such an honourable manner of John, that to condemn John as an impostor, would imply a like censure on the character of Jesus.

He confounds them by asking what they thought of John.
obey your commands: and yet, after all, he went not to the vineyard, but spent the whole day elsewhere.

Now I would leave it to yourselves to judge Which of the two youths I have been speaking of did the will of [his] father, and with which of them he would, on the whole, be best pleased? and without any hesitation they say to him, Undoubtedly the first of them.

Then Jesus, upon this, says to them, The application of this parable is very easy; for thus it is, that notwithstanding your professions of a regard to God, yet in your practice you are disobedient children, and reject his gospel; and verily I say unto you, That even the most abandoned sinners of the age, such as the publicans and common prostitutes, are much more open to conviction, and more likely to be wrought upon than you; and so many of them have already been awakened to repentance, that their example might lead you the way into the kingdom of God, but with all your pretences to sanctity you will not follow them. For, though you have not integrity enough freely to own it, you know in your own consciences, that John came not unto you in a suspicious manner, but in the way of righteousness, and did in all his ministry maintain the uniform character of an upright and pious man, as well as of a plain and awakening preacher, yet you believed him not; but the publicans and harlots, of whom I spake, believed him; and you were still so obstinate, that even when you saw [it], and perceived a growing reformation amongst the most abandoned of mankind, yet you did not afterwards repent, [so as] to believe in him. (Compare Luke vii. 29, 30. Vol. I. p. 305.) And therefore I solemnly warn you, that your condition will another day be worse than theirs; and that you shall see those whom you now despise and abhor, entering into the glory from which you shall be excluded.

How little do the most specious pretences of piety signify if they are not animated by the heart, and confirmed by the life!

bSir, I am going.] This was a proper emblem of the hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees, who addressed God under the most honourable titles, and professed the greatest readiness and zeal in his service, while their whole lives were a series of disobedience and rebellion.
The parable of the vineyard let to wicked husbandmen.

life! How vain are all the complimentary forms of religion when addressed to that God who penetrates all the secrets of the soul, and can have complacency in nothing but real and solid goodness! 28-31 Yet how many are there, who are free of their promises both to God and man, but always fail when the time of performance comes! And how many, with these unhappy rulers in Israel, go on to pride themselves in a kind of external nearness to God, and perhaps in a boasted commission from him, who are themselves so far from his kingdom, that even publicans and harlots, who did not pretend to any religion, are more like to be brought into it than they, as being more open to a conviction of their sin and danger, and so more ready to embrace an offered Saviour! Let us dread the guilt of receiving the grace of God in vain, lest by rejecting the calls of the gospel, and abusing the privileges we enjoy, our hearts be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, so as to perish in impenitence and unbelief.

In vain do we, like these Pharisees, inquire into the evidences of Christ's authority, if we are not heartily resolved to submit to it. Yet with such cavillers and hypocrites must his ministers expect to meet. May they learn, by the example of their great Master to answer them with the meekness of wisdom, and to join the sagacity of the serpent with the gentleness and innocence of the dove.'

The promises which are made to a miraculous faith in prayer, are not indeed our immediate concern; but we may truly infer from them some encouragement in favour of the prayer of faith, on whatever account, and in whatever circumstances it be offered. 25, 26 At least we may infer the necessity of forgiving injuries, if we desire that our petitions should be received with favour. Let us remember it; and labour to approach the throne of a forgiving God, with hearts not only clear of every malignant passion, but full of that cordial and universal benevolence which may engage us to pray for all men, and particularly for those who have least deserved our kindness, and seem least disposed to requite it.

SECT. CLII.

Christ utters the parable of the vineyard let out to unfaithful husbandmen; from which he takes occasion plainly to admonish the Jewish rulers of the danger and ruin they would incur by the schemes they were forming against him, Mat. XXI. 33, to the end; Mark XII._1—12. Luke XX. 9—19.

Mat. XXI. 33. HEAR another parable: There was a certain questioning his authority, and shewn how inexcusable they were in not believing John, though they could not deny him to be sent of God, continued his discourse, and said to them and to the people, Hear now another parable, in which you are very nearly concerned, as your own consciences must quickly tell you: There was a certain man, a master of a considerable family and estate, who planted a vineyard, and spared no cost to render it fruitful; for he made a strong hedge round it, to preserve it from the incursion of men or beasts, and dug [a place for] a wine-press in it, [or] a large cavity which might serve as a fat for the wine, to receive the liquor when pres-seed from the grapes; and he also built a tower in it for the accommodation and defence of the labourers; and then he let it out to husbandmen, who were to pay him a certain acknowledgment out of the produce of it; and he himself departed thence, and took a journey for a long time into a distant country.

34 And at the proper season, when the time of gathering in the fruit approached, and a return was to be made him from the profits of it, he sent his servants to the husbandmen who had farmed it, that he might receive from the husbandmen that proportion of the fruit of the vineyard which was due to him for the rent. And the husbandmen wickedly conspired to keep the vineyard to themselves, instead of receiving them with due respect, and returning the appointed payment, seized his servants, and beat one of the chief of those who arrived first, and sent him empty away: and as the demand grew more pressing, they took up the weapons with which their Lord himself had furnished them for very different purposes, and slew another, and stoned another;
till they had driven him away.

35 And when their lord heard the report of this their injustice, he did not immediately arm himself against them, but sent again other servants to treat with them, more in number, and higher in office than the first; but still persisting in their wickedness, they did the same unto them; and

Luke xxi. 13. Then said the lord of the vineyard, What shall I do? I will send my own son, and they will reverence my son. [Mark, having yet therefore one son, his well beloved, he sent him also last [of all] unto them, saying, It may be they will reverence my son when they see him. [Mat. xxi. 37. Mark xii. 6.]

Mat. xxi. 38. But when the husbandmen saw the son, [Luke, they reasoned among themselves, saying, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance. [Luke, that it may be ours.] Mark xii. 7. Luke xx. 14.]

39 And they caught him, particularly at him [who was the chief] person employed to account with them they threw stones and wounded him dangerously in the head, and sent him away not only empty, but very dishonourably and shamefully treated.

And again the third [time he sent another of his principal servants; and him also they wounded as they had done the former, and even were so outrageous, that they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him: and in like manner they assaulted many others, who came with, or after him, on the same errand, beating some of them, and killing others outright.

Then the lord of the vineyard, being still unwilling to proceed to the last extremity with them, though they had been so very wicked and ungrateful in the treatment of his servants, said to them that were about him, What shall I do farther to reclaim them? I will send my own son to them. Having yet therefore one son, who was his well beloved, and the heir of the family he sent him also last of all to them, as the only gentle expedient that remained, saying, Perhaps they will reverence my son when they see him: for surely they must needs have some respect for him, and will not presume to offer him any injury. But when [the husbandmen] saw the son [come into the vineyard, instead of paying any due regard to him, they grew yet more outrageous in their wickedness, and reasoned among themselves, saying, This is the only heir of the whole estate, come, let us kill him, and seize on his inheritance, that it may be ours from generation to generation, and no descendants of our master may remain to give any disturbance to us or our children in the possession of it. And with malignant hearts and cruel hands they fell upon

b I will send my son.] The question is not here how prudent it would have been in a human father to venture his son in such a case as this; for the power which God had of raising Christ from the dead, and making all his sufferings redound to his glory and happiness, quite alters the case. The design is to shew the patience of God, and the wickedness of the Jews, by this emblem, than which nothing could be more expressive.

c Perhaps they will reverence my son, &c.] Numberless predictions in the Old and New Testament plainly shew, that God foresaw Christ's death as a certain event. This therefore like many others, is merely an ornamental circumstance, which cannot without absurdity be applied in the interpretation of the parable.

d Come let us kill him, &c.] If such a proposal would have been the height of folly as well as wickedness in these husbandmen, it was so much the more proper to represent the part the Jewish rulers acted in the murder of Christ, which they were now projecting, and which they accomplished within three days. The admonition was most graciously given; but served only in an astonishing manner to illustrate that degree of hardness to which a sinful heart is capable of arriving.
And when at last he sent his son they killed him.

40 When therefore the Lord of the vineyard himself cometh, armed with a power which they will be utterly unable to resist, what will he do, think you, to those treacherous and cruel husbandmen, when he has them entirely at his disposal?

41 And, as the Jewish rulers did not understand that they themselves were these unfaithful husbandmen, they say unto him, There is no doubt but he will wretchedly destroy those wicked and incorrigible wretches, nor is the most tormenting death too severe for them to expect; and he will then let out the vineyard to other husbandmen, who shall faithfully render him the fruits of it in their proper seasons.

Thus did they, before they were aware, condemn themselves; and [Jesus added,] You have answered right: he shall indeed quickly come, and destroy these husbandmen of whom I speak, whoever they shall appear to be, with terrible severity, and will give the vineyard to others. Now all this was if he had said; Consider your own concern in what you have heard: God has planted a church among you, and given you an excellent revelation of his will; abundant provision has been made, both for your protection and your improvement too: but you have ungratefully refused the fruits of obedience, which were so justly his due; and when he has frequently sent his servants the prophets, with one message and demand after another, you the rulers and teachers of Israel, to whom the cultivation of the vineyard has been committed, have treated them in a most ungrateful and barbarous manner: and now at last he has sent his son, and you are going to seize on him, and to add that murder which you are now contriving to the guilt of the vineyard, and slew him.

And cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him. [Mark xii. 8. Luke xx. 15.—] 40 When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, what will he do unto those husbandmen? [Mark ii. 9.—Luke xx. —15.] 41 They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons.

Luke xx. 16.—[Jesus said] He shall come and destroy these husbandmen, and shall give the vineyard to others. [Mark xii.—9.]
guilt of all your other crimes. I leave it therefore to your own consciences to judge what the event must be. And for this reason now I say unto you plainly, That the kingdom of God, which you have thus vilely and ungratefully abused, shall be taken away from you, and given to a nation which shall bring forth the fruits thereof; that is, his gospel shall be take from you, and be carried to the Gentiles, who will have more regard to the favour shewn them, and improve it much better than you have done.

And when they heard this sad denunciation with which the parable concluded, and found that [it] was aimed at them, they said, God forbid that this should be the case with regard to us, nor can we ever believe that it will.

And Jesus looked upon them with great seriousness and solemnity in his countenance, and said unto them, What is this then that is written? (Ps. cxviii. 22, 23.) Did you never read, or never reflect upon, this remarkable passage in the scriptures; The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head-stone of the corner: that is the Lord's doing, and it is wonderful in our eyes? Words which though they might seem to be accomplished in the exaltation of David to the Jewish throne, are in their highest sense applicable to the Messiah, who, though disdainfully rejected by you scribes and Pharisees and rulers of the people, whose office is to build up the church, is nevertheless chosen by God to be its great support and ornament. And therefore let me plainly tell you, That whosoever shall fall upon this stone, that is, whosoever shall stumble at me and my doctrine, while I am here on earth in this humble form, he shall be broken and damaged by it; but on whomsoever it shall fall, when raised up to so glorious an eminence,

The head-stone of the corner.] This I take to be the meaning of the words σημαίναι τίθημι, rather than the chief corner-stone, as it does not appear exactly to answer to αὐτὸν ἀποκεφαλίζω Eph. ii. 20, and 1 Pet. ii. 6.) which, as the connection in those places shows (as well as the use of it in other authors), signifies that great corner-stone which lay at the bottom of the building as its support. What is mentioned afterwards of this head-stone falling on a person, seems not to suit with the supposition of its being laid on or under the ground. Compare Zech. iv. 7.

Though they might seem to be accomplished in the exaltation of David, etc. Mr. Jeffrey has justly observed (in his Review, p. 119) that on the principles of Analogy, this passage will be much to the present purpose; though it should be confessed that Psal. cxviii. was immediately meant of David: as it will prove that the great builders of Israel might refuse one whom God intended for the Head-stone of the corner.
eminence, it shall even grind him to powder, like a brittle potsherd crushed by the weight of some huge stone falling upon it from on high: (compare Dan. ii. 44.) So whosoever shall oppose me after my exaltation to glory, and the pouring out of my Spirit for the full revelation of my gospel and proof of my mission, he will bring upon himself aggravated guilt, and dreadful unavoidable destruction.

19 And when the chief priests and the scribes and Pharisees had heard his parables which he had now delivered, they were so provoked at what he had said, that even in that very hour they sought to lay their hands on him, that they might prosecute him even to death; for they plainly perceived that he had spoken this parable of the wicked husbandmen that should be destroyed against them, and had in effect set them all at defiance by the application of so signal a prophecy to himself. But they feared the people who were then present in the temple, because they esteemed him as a Prophet sent from God, and would not have borne that immediate assault upon him which the rage of these rulers would otherwise have engaged them to make. And therefore, not daring for the present to attempt to seize him with an open violence, they left him and went away to take counsel in private against him, and to lay a plot for his life, which they might execute with less hazard to themselves.

IMPROVEMENT.

When we read this parable, and consider it as levelled at the Jews, we applaud the righteous judgment of God in reverting so severely upon them the quarrel of his covenant, and the blood of his Son; but let us take heed to ourselves, let we also fall after the same example of unbelief. (Heb. iv. 11.)

Dr. Whitby supposes that here is an allusion to the two different ways of stoning among the Jews; the former, by throwing a person down upon a great stone; and the other, by letting a stone fall upon him. But as I cannot see that the latter was at all more dreadful than the former, since in such a case a quick dispatch might seem most desirable, it seems to me that the force and beauty of this pathetic passage would be in a great measure lost by such an interpretation.

They perceived that he had spoken this parable against them. One would think they could be at no loss for the interpretation of it, considering how nearly it resembles that in Isa. v. 1—7, with which they were, no doubt, well acquainted. Only it is to be observed that there Israel is the vineyard, here the true religion is represented under that figure; accordingly there it is threatened that the vineyard should be destroyed, but here that it should be let out to other husbandmen; each event suiting its connection.
Reflections on the parable of the unfaithful husbandmen.

God has given to every man some part of his vineyard to cultivate and improve, or some advantages to know and serve him. And as for us who enjoy the Christian dispensation, we have particular reason to say, the lines are fallen to us in pleasant places. (Psal. xvi. 6.) What could he have done more for this part of his vineyard? How ungrateful therefore shall we be, and how miserable too, if we with-hold the fruits he so reasonably expects; if we slight the messengers by whom he so frequently and so pathetically demands them; yea, if by wilful impenitence and unbelie we in effect renew the slaughter of his beloved Son, after that amazing favour he has done us, in charging him with an embassy of peace to us, whose aggravated crimes had long since deserved that he should have sent amongst us the messengers of his vengeance. Oh that we may never be condemned out of our own mouths in the censures we pass on the guilty Jews!

We cannot surely think of the awful threatening of our Lord without some secret terror for ourselves, when we consider how shamefully we of this nation have abused our privileges. The kingdom of God, said he, shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. God had been just had he long since executed such a judgment upon us: may he be merciful to us all in suspending and averting it! May his compassion particularly extend to those amongst us who reject Christianity; for the passage before us has a dreadful aspect upon such! Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear; whether they will submit, or whether they will oppose; Christ is made the head of the corner, and God will for ever establish him as such. Wo to them who, instead of joining with him, and fixing the stress of their souls upon him, deliberately set themselves to oppose his cause and interest! On such undoubtedly will he fall like a mighty rock of adamant, and miserably crush them in pieces, and grind them to powder.

Thus did our Lord warn his enemies most wisely and most graciously; but they despised the admonition, and hated him for what was so kindly intended. They sought to lay hands on him because he had spoken this parable against them. High provocation indeed, to set their danger faithfully before them, that if by any means it were possible they might be awakened to escape it! But, alas, what can save those whose spiritual distempers are exasperated by the most proper remedies prescribed for their cure.
Jesus delivers the parable of the marriage-feast.

SECT. CLIII.

Christ farther warns the Jews of the danger which would attend their rejecting the gospel, or resting in an insincere profession of it, by the parable of the marriage-feast and the wedding-garment. Mat. XXII. 1—14.

Mat. XXII. 1.

And when the priests and scribes were retired, Jesus, being still surrounded with the multitude, answered and spake to them again in parables, suited to the present circumstances of affairs, saying, The kingdom of heaven, or the dispensation of the gospel, is like, and may be well compared to, that which happened in the case of a man [that was] a king, who made a splendid marriage-feast for his son. And when all was prepared, he sent his servants to call those who had been before invited, that they might come immediately to the nuptial banquet. But they were so rude and foolish, that they would not come upon the summons. 4 Again he sent other of his servants, saying, Go and tell them that were invited, that I must insist upon their coming immediately; for behold, I have prepared my dinner; my oxen and my other fatted beasts are slain and dressed, and all things are just ready to be served up to the table; therefore come to the marriage-feast without any farther delay. But such was the perverseness of the guests, that, notwithstanding this repeated invitation, they refused to come; and not regarding [it], they went away, one of them to

2 The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son. 3 And sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding: and they would not come.

4 And again he sent forth other servants, saying, Tell them which are hidden, Behold, I have prepared my dinner: my oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are ready: come unto the marriage.

5 But they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandise:

The kingdom of heaven is like a king.
6 And the remnant took his servants, and entreated them spitefully, and slew them.

7 But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth: and he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burnt up their city.

8 Then saith he to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they which were hidden were not worthy.

9 Go ye therefore into the high-ways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage.

10 So those servants went out into the high ways; and gathered together all, as many as they found, both bad and good: and the wedding was furnished with guests.

11 And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding-garment:

And, not long after, having sent his armies, &c.] This clause must be supposed to come in by way of prolixity or anticipation, for it is plain there could not be time, before the feast already prepared was served up, to attempt an execution of this kind. This circumstance seems to point at the slaughter of the Jews, and the burning of Jerusalem and the other chief cities of their country by the Romans; who are here considered as the armies of their affronted prince, whose ambassadors they had indeed most cruelly and ungratefully murdered.

And his servants, &c.] Or, his armies.

The most public ways, &c.] The phrase ἐκείνης τῶν Ἰωάν, signifies the ways which were most frequented; which must be such as are mentioned in the paraphrase. (See Bonitus, Compar. in loc.) This intimates that the Gentiles had as little reason to expect the call of the gospel as common passengers and travellers to expect an invitation to a royal banquet.

B. Who, though such habits were provided, yet was not clothed with a wedding-garment.] That persons making an entertainment sometimes furnished the habits in which the guests should appear, is evident from what Homer says of Ulysses being thus furnished.
The king orders him without the wedding-garment to be cast out.

12 And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding-garment suited to the occasion? Was it not offered to thee? or hadst thou so little sense of decency and gratitude as to refuse to accept it in compliance with the order of my feast? And he was presently struck speechless, being confounded with the majesty of the royal presence, and conscious of his own insolence and folly. Then the king, being justly incensed at so great an affront, resolved to punish it by a severe imprisonment; and therefore said to [his] servants, Bind his hands and feet, and take him away hence, from all the joy and splendor of the guest-chamber, and cast him out into the darkness which is without; and there, instead of the mirth and delight of my banquet, there shall be nothing but weeping and gnashing of the teeth for anguish and despair. (Compare Mat. viii. 12. Vol. I. p. 295.)

13 Nor imagine, said our Lord in the conclusion and improvement of the parable, that this will be the case of one alone; for though it be a dreadful truth, yet I must say, that even the greatest furnished by the Phenicians (Odys. lib. viii. ver. 402); and from the account which Dioclurus gives of the great hospitality of Cellias the Sicilian, who readily received all strangers, and at once supplied 300 horsemen with clothes, who by a violent storm were driven to take shelter with him: (Diod. Sic. lib. xiii. p. 375. Ed. Steph.)—Now it was usual, more especially at marriage-feasts, for persons to appear in a sumptuous dress, adorned, as some writers tell us, with florid embroidery (Dr. Hammond, in loc.) though many times white garments seem to have been used on such occasions: (compare Rev. xix. 8, 9.) But as it could not be expected that travellers thus pressed in should themselves be provided with a suitable habit, we must therefore conclude, not only from the magnitude of the preparations, to which we must suppose the wardrobe of the prince corresponded, but likewise from the following circumstance of resentment against this guest, that a robe was offered, but refused by him. And this is a circumstance which (as Calvin observes) is admirably suited to the method of God's dealing with us; who indeed requires holiness in order to our receiving the benefits of the gospel, but is graciously pleased to work it in us by his Holy Spirit; and therefore may justly resent and punish our neglect of so great a favour.

[Observe that this expression is in the passive form, and is very expressive. It is applied to the muzzling of cattle, 1 Cor. ix. 9. Compare 1 Tim. v. 18. and 1 Pet. ii. 15.]

14 And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding-garment? And he was speechless.
Reflections on our being called to the gospel-feast.

called, but few are chosen.

greatest part of those to whom the gospel is offered will either openly reject or secretly disobey it; and while many indeed are called to the gospel-feast, it will be manifest, by their disregarding it, there are but few chosen in such a sense as finally to partake of its blessings. (Compare Mat. xx. 16. p. 114.) Thus did he strongly intimate to the Jews, that since they despised the rich provisions of his gospel-grace, incomparably more valuable than those of a royal feast, and since they used the messengers whom God had sent to them in so ungrateful and barbarous a manner, they must expect to be cut off and destroyed by those hostile armies which Divine Providence would speedily bring upon them; but that the gospel should be embraced by the Gentiles, and vast numbers of them be converted and saved by it. And he farther intended to insinuate, by the circumstance of the wedding-garment, that as God had made provision in his gospel for the sanctification of man's hearts, and the reformation of their lives, he expected true holiness and cordial obedience from all who professed to embrace it; and would another day take a strict review of all its professors, that he might separate habitual sinners from the number and the blessings of his people, and deliver them over to perpetual darkness and misery.

IMPROVEMENT.

How rich are the provisions of the gospel! a feast indeed becoming the bounty and majesty of the King of heaven; and proportionable even to the love which he bears to his own Son, in honour of whom it is made!

How wonderful is the grace which calls us to the participation of these provisions; us, who were originally sinners of the Gentiles, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenant of promise! (Eph. ii. 12.) Yet has he graciously sent his messengers to us, and invited us to his house, yea, to his table, with the additional hope of yet nobler entertainments in reserve. May none of us reject so condescending a call, lest we turn his goodness into righteous indignation, and treasure up to ourselves wrath against the day of wrath! (Rom. ii. 5.)

Let us also remember, that it is not every one who professes to accept the entertainment, not every one who talks of gospel-blessings,
The Pharisees and Herodians come to Jesus to ensnare him.

Our Lord confounds the Pharisees and Herodians when they hoped to have ensnared him by their question relating to the lawfulness of paying the Roman tribute. Mat. XXII. 15—22. Mark XII. 13—17. Luke XX. 20—26.

Mat. XXII. 15. THEN the Pharisees, stung with the severe but just rebukes he had been giving them in the foregoing parables, went out from his presence, and retiring, took counsel together how they might ensnare him in [his] discourse, and find something on which they might ground an accusation or complaint against him. And they narrowly watched him in all his motions that day, and sent out spies to try if they could take him at an advantage, who should pretend themselves to be righteous men, that were come, for the case of their certain [disciples] of the Pharisees and of the Herodians, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor. [Mat. xxii. 16. Mark xii. 13.]

21 And [Mark, when they were come] they asked him saying, Master, we know that thou [art true, and] sayest and teachest rightly [neither carest thou for any man; for thou regardest not the person of men.] [Mark, but teachest the way of God in truth: ] [Mat. xxii.—16. Mark xii, 14.—]

And when they were come to him, in order to accomplish their design, they craftily accosted him with an air of great respect, and with flattering expressions of the highest esteem; and asked him, saying, Master, we know, and are well satisfied, that thou art true and upright; and as thou comest as a Messenger from God, so, after the example of those faithful and courageous prophets who were in Israel in its better ages, thou sayest and teachest rightly, and art impartial and sincere in everything that thou declarest; neither carest thou for the censure or applause of any man; for thou regardest not the person of men, so as to be influenced by complaisance or fear, or any private views whatever, to deviate from the strictest integrity and veracity; but plainly teachest the way of God and the path of duty.

That they might lay hold on his words.] They hoped to have ensnared him by the question they came to propose, whatever answer he could have returned. If he asserted on the one hand, that tribute was to be paid to Caesar, the Pharisees, who generally maintained (as Judas Gaulonites had done) that such a subjection to a foreign power was inconsistent with the privileges of God's peculiar people, would have endeavoured to expose him to popular resentment, as betraying the liberties of his country. On the other hand, had he denied the lawfulness of this tribute, the Herodians would have had a very plausible pretence of accusing him to the Roman power, as a seditious person, which his persecutors had afterwards the assurance to do; (Luke xxiii. 2, sect. clxxxvi.) Nay, perhaps, the very circumstance of taking upon him to determine such a question might, by these invidious inquirers, be construed as a pretence to sovereignty. See Voss. Harmon. Evang. p. 54, 55.
He bids them render to Caesar what is Caesar's, &c.

Mat. XXII. 17.—Tell us therefore, What thinkest thou? Is it lawful for us Jews, who are the peculiar people of God, and are many of us in conscience tender of acknowledging any king but him, or one of our brethren appointed by his immediate delegation, to pay the usual tribute to Caesar, the Roman Emperor, or not? What dost thou advise in this case, as right for us to do? Shall we give it to the collectors, or shall we not give it? We must beg an immediate answer, for the tribute is even now demanded of us. And here they ceased, as thinking they had him in an inextricable snare, and that he could return no answer which would not expose him to the severe resentment either of the Jewish people or of the Roman officers.

But Jesus, knowing their hypocrisy, which was indeed their reigning character, perceived their craftiness [and] wickedness in this address, however pious and respectful it appeared, and therefore said to them, Ye hypocrites, Why do ye tempt me by such an ensnaring question, and seek to draw me into danger and destruction by it? Is this a proof of your regard and friendship to a faithful and impartial Teacher? But that I may return a proper answer to your question, whatever be the view that you may have in asking it, show me the tribute money which is demanded of you; and bring me either a penny, or denarius, that I may see it. And they brought him a Roman penny. And, looking upon it, he says to them, Whose is this image which is struck upon the coin, and whose inscription and title is this [which] it has round it? And they, without

b One of our brethren, &c.] We are told that the grand argument which the followers of Judas Gagolotæs, and others inclined to their party, urged, as decisive against the authority of the Romans, was that text which prohibited their setting a stranger to be king over them, Deut. xvii. 15. And Grotius (in his note on Mat. xxii. 16.) seems to think it was this that formerly engaged them so vigorously to oppose the Chaldeans, and to refuse submitting to their government, till Jerusalem was destroyed. See note a on Luke xiii. 1, p. 7. c Whose is this image and inscription?] Dr. Lightfoot tells us (in his Hor. Heb. on Mat. xxii. 20) that the Jews have a traditio without perceiving his design, immediately answered and said to him, It is Cæsar’s: thereby in effect acknowledging that they were under his dominion, by their admitting his coin as current among them. And Jesus answering said unto them, Render therefore to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar’s, and to God the things which are God’s; and labour so to adjust your regards and duties to both, that you may not on the one hand, under pretence of religion, do any injury to Cæsar, nor on the other hand, under pretence of duty to Cæsar, violate any of the commands of God, or fail of that respect to him which he requires: whereby he plainly intimated that tribute was to be paid to Cæsar as due to his government; yet did it in such a manner, and with such restrictions, as presented the inconvenience of a more express declaration.

And when they had heard [his] wise and unexceptionable [answer], they plainly found that they could not take hold of his words before the people; and they marvelled at his answer, and held their peace [and left him, and went their way.] [Matt. xxii. 22. Mark xii.—17.]

Luke xx. 26. And [when they had heard these words] they could not take hold of his words before the people; and they marvelled at his answer, and held their peace [and left him, and went their way.] [Matt. xxii. 22. Mark xii.—17.]

And to God the things which are God’s.] Diodate, Raphelius, and some other commentators, interpret this as a caution against omitting the sacred tribute, on pretence of answering the demands of Cæsar, who (they say) had claimed it to himself. But I apprehend our Lord had a more extensive view; and that as he cautions the Pharisees against using religion as a pretext to justify sedition, so he also warns the Herodians, that they should not, as they were too inclined to do, make a compliment of their religion to the Romans, by complying with those things which were forbidden by the Divine law, that they might ingratiate themselves with Cæsar’s party. See Prideaux’s Connection, Vol. II. p. 366—368.

IMPROVEMENT
Again does our Lord renew the repeated lesson he had before given us, both by precept and example, of uniting wisdom and innocence. How admirable was this mixture of prudence and integrity with which he confounded these Pharisees and Herodians, who, contrary as their principles and interests were, conspired against him! For of a truth, O Lord, against thine holy Child Jesus, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, and the people of Israel, were gathered together (Acts iv. 27); and their words were softer than oil, when war and murder was in their hearts. (Psal. iv. 21.)

Let us, not, with the simple, believe every flattering word (Prov. xiv. 15), since sometimes the highest encomiums may be designed as the instruments of mischief: and too often they prove so when they are not treacherously intended.

Our Lord was indeed the Person whom these artful hypocrites described; and was in that respect an excellent Pattern to all his followers, and especially to his ministers. He knew no man in the discharge of his office; but, without regarding the persons of any, neither seeking their favour nor fearing their resentment, he taught the way of God in truth, and declared the whole of his counsel.

Let us particularly attend to his decision in the present case, and learn with the utmost readiness to render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar’s, and unto God the things which are God’s. Our civil magistrates, by virtue of their office, justly claim our reverent regard; and tribute is most reasonably due to those who attend continually to the service of the public, and are, under God, the pillars of our common tranquility and happiness. (Rom. xiii. 6, 7.) Let that tribute therefore be justly and freely rendered with honour, and with cheerfulness; as he is surely unworthy to share in the benefits of government who will not contribute his part towards its necessary expence. But let it also be remembered that the rights of God are sacred and inviolable: he, and he alone, is the Lord of conscience; and when that is invaded, it is easy to judge whether man or God is to be obeyed; (Acts iv. 19.) Let us be daily thankful that in our own age and country these rights are so happily united. May a guardian Providence continue to watch over both! and may we seriously consider how impossible it is, under such a government, to be good Christians, without being obedient subjects, or to fear God, if we do not honour the king! (1 Pet. ii. 17.)
The Pharisees urge a difficulty against the resurrection.

SECT. CLV.

Our Lord proves the resurrection to the Sadducees, and answers their foolish objection against it. Mat. XXII, 23—33; Mark XII, 18—27; Luke XX, 27—40.

Luke XX, 27. Then [the same day] came to him certain of the Sadducees, which deny that there is any resurrection; and they asked him, [Mat. xxii. 23. Mark xii. 18.]

23 Saying, Master, Moses [said and] wrote unto us, If any man's brother die, [Mark, and leave his wife behind him, and leave no children], that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. [Mat. xxii. 24. Mark xii. 19.]

Mat. XXII, 25. Now there were with us seven brethren; and the first, when he had married a wife, deceased, and having no [Luke, children], left his wife unto his brother. [Mark xii. 20.—Luke xx. 29.]

a Who deny there is any resurrection.] It is generally known that their master Sado-oc, from whom the Sadducees took their name, taught that God was not to be served from mercenary principles, that is (as he crudely explained it), from hope of reward, or fear of punishment. His followers interpreted this as an implicit denial of a future state, and so imbued that puerile notion of the utter destruction of the soul at death, equally uncomfortable and absurd. See Quintus, in loc.—The story which they mention here seems to have been a kind of common-place objection, as we meet with it in the old Jewish writers. See Lightfoot Hor. Hebr., in loc.

b Or any future state, &c.] As it is expressly said, Acts xii. 8, that they denied any spirits, and consequently the existence of the soul in a separate state; so our Lord's answer here, and much of St. Paul's reasoning in 1 Cor. xv. goes on the supposition of such a denial on their part. See 2 Mac. xii. 42—44, where the author proves that Judas believed a resurrection, from his offering sacrifices for the souls of the slain.
Jesus shews their mistaken notion of the resurrection.

Luke xx. 30. And the second took her to wife, and he [likewise] died childless. [Mat. xxii. 26. Mark xii. 21.]

31 And the third took her: and in like manner the seven also [Mark, had her]; And they left no children, and died [Mat. xxii. 26. Mark xii. 21. 22.]

32 [And] last of all the woman died also. [Mat. xxii. 27. Mark xii.—22.]

33 Therefore in the resurrection [Mark, when they shall rise], whose wife [shall she be of the seven]? for all the seven had her to wife: and as they stood in an equal relation to her in this world, they all seem to have exactly an equal claim to her in the next.

Thus they attempted in a sneering manner to overthrow all the arguments for a future state, which might be advanced either from reason, or from scripture. And Jesus therefore answered and said to them, It plainly appears from your manner of stating the question, that you are greatly mistaken, and go entirely on a wrong supposition; not knowing, on the one hand, what is so plainly intimated in the scriptures of a resurrection, which, if well understood, implies no contradiction at all; nor attending on the other hand, to the power of God, which is able with infinite ease to effect what to man seems most difficult and improbable.

And as to this particular difficulty which you now object, it ought to be considered, that the children of this world do indeed marry, and are given in marriage, according to the wise provision which God has made by that institution, for repairing the wastes of mortality by the production of new generations. But they who shall be counted worthy to obtain that blessed world which God has prepared for his people above, and to be admitted to the never-fading honours that will succeed the resurrection of good men from the dead, will be in very different circumstances when they shall rise, and neither marry, nor are given in marriage: For they can die no more, and therefore the rise of new generations is no longer necessary; since in this respect they

35 But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead [Mark, when they shall rise,] neither marry, nor are given in marriage. [Mat. xxii. 50. Mark xii. 25.]

36 Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels [of God]
they are equal to the angels of God in heaven, and are the children of God, and heirs of immortality and glory, being the children of the resurrection, which shall instate them in a complete felicity, answerable to so near a relation to the Divine Being: and consequently all such difficulties as you have now been urging are entirely superseded by the happiness and perfection of so exalted a state.

But as for the evidence of the resurrection in general, not to insist on many plainer passages in the other books of scripture, for which you do not profess so great a regard, I may say, that even Moses in effect showed that the dead are to be raised, when speaking of what happened at the burning bush (Exod. iii. 6) he calls the Lord, from whom he there received his commission, "the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and of Jacob: [Mark, have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God

Ar: equal to the angels of God in heaven.] Matthew and Mark say only that they are as the angels (καί ἀγγέλους), and though Luke expresses it by a stronger word (ὡς ἀγγέλον), that they are equal to the angels, yet all arguments drawn from hence, as proving an entire equality of glorified saints with angels in all respects, must be apparently weak and inconclusive. It is indeed the glorious scheme of redeeming love to incorporate angels and saints into one happy society under Christ as their common Head, (Eph. i. 10,) but there are subordinations in united societies. And if the fall of the apostate spirits occasioned anything like a vacancy in the celestial hierarchy, it would seem most probably it might be filled up from heavenly spirits of an inferior order, who might be preferred to the rank their degenerate brethren lost, as a reward for their approved fidelity to God. But it becomes us to be exceeding modest in our conjectures on such subjects as these, lest we incur the censure of intruding into things which we have not seen. Col. ii. 18.

And are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.] This plainly intimates that good men are called God's children, with a view to the inheritance to which they are adopted, on the final possession of which they enter at resurrection. Compare Rom. viii. 17. Gal. iv. 7. 1 John iii. 2. and Rom. viii. 29. See the Essay on Divine Dispensations, p. 8, 9.

Other books of scripture, for which you do not profess so great a regard.] The Sadducees are thought by many to have agreed with the Samaritans in rejecting all the other parts of holy scripture but the five books of Moses; which is particularly contended for by Serrarius. (Triheres, lib. ii. cap. 21, and Mineral. lib. iv. cap. 14.) But this is questioned by Drusius (ad tribus sectis, lib. iii. cap. 9), and Belon (Antiq. Heb. part ii. cap. 11) and Scaliger maintains the contrary, and shews that the passage from Josephus (Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 10 (al. 18), § 6), which is commonly alluded in defence of that opinion, only relates to their rejecting all traditions. (Erench. Triheres, cap. 16.) And indeed, as it appears from the Talmud that other parts of the Old Testament were often quoted by the Sadducees, and arguments were brought from thence against them by the Pharisees to prove the resurrection, which they endeavoured only to evade, without disputing the authority of texts, though they were not taken from the laws of Moses; it is more reasonable to believe with Dr. Lightfoot (in his Hor. Hebr. on John iv. 23), that they did not reject the other books of the Old Testament, but only gave a great preference to the five books of Moses; and, laying it down as a principle, receive nothing as an article of faith, which could not be proved from the law, if anything was urged from other parts of scripture that could not be deduced from Moses, they would explain it in some other way. And this might be sufficient to induce our Lord to bring his argument to prove the resurrection from what Moses had said, and to confirm it by that part of scripture which was most regarded by the Sadducees, and upon which they now had grounded their objection to it. 51 cc.
God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

'I am the God of Abraham, &c.'] It is surprising to me to find learned men so much divided in their sentiments on this easy text. The force of the argument cannot surely rest on the word [am]; because though it be in the Greek, it is not in the Hebrew, where the words may possibly signify, I [have been] the God of Abraham, &c. and the possibility of such a version would affect the conclusion on that supposition. But our Lord's argument is equally forcible either way; for it is evident, that it cannot properly be said, that God either actually is, or hath been, the God of any whom he has suffered finally to perish; and (as the apostle strongly intimates) he would, humanly speaking, be ashamed, or think it infinitely beneath him, to own that relation to any for whom he had not provided a city, or a state of more permanent happiness than any which could be enjoyed in this mortal life. (See Heb. xi. 16.) So that the argument no means turns (as Archbishop Tillotson and Grotius suppose) on the calamitous circumstances in which these patriarchs often were; but would have held good, had all their lives been as prosperous and glorious as that of Abraham seems generally, notwithstanding his peregrinations, to have been.—I cannot, as some modern writers of note do, fall in with Mr. Mede's notion, (in his Works, p. 801, 803), that our Lord refers to the necessity of Abraham's being raised from the dead to inherit Canaan, in order to the accomplishment of God's promise to give it to him; both because I can see no such necessity, and because then I think it would have been much more to our Lord's purpose to have quoted the promise of the land of Canaan, than these general words.

[38 For God is not a God of the dead, but [Mark, the God] of the living; for all live unto him: [Mark, Ye therefore do greatly err.] Mat. xxii.—32. Markxii.—27.]

he must be an everlasting patron and friend to them, even to their whole persons, so as to recover their mortal part from the ruin and desolation of the grave. And therefore, on the whole, you greatly err, in denying this doctrine; and your error tends to bring a disgrace on the whole series of Divine revelation, and to weaken one of the strongest motives to a life of holiness and obedience.

Then some of the scribes who were present, being of the sect of the Pharisées, were pleased to hear a doctrine of their own so judiciously defended, and said in reply, Master, thou hast spoken so well upon this subject, that nothing solid can be objected to thy discourse. And indeed when all the multitude that was present in the temple at that time heard [this] unthought of, yet convincing, argument, together with so clear an answer to a cavil in which the Sadducees used to triumph as invincible, they were greatly astonished at his doctrine, and plainly testified the admiration and delight with which they had attended his discourse. And as the Sadducees had nothing to reply, they were ashamed and disappointed; and after that they durst not any more presume to ask him any thing at all, but retired in silence and confusion.

IMPROVEMENT.

With what satisfaction should we read this vindication of so important an article of our faith and hope! Easily was this boasted argument of the Sadducees unravelled and exposed, and all the pride of those bold wits, who valued themselves so much on their imaginary penetration which laid men almost on a level with brutes, covered with just confusion. Indeed objections against the resurrection, much more plausible than this of theirs, may be answered in that one saying of our Lord's: Ye know not the scriptures, nor the power of God. Were the scripture doctrine of the resurrection considered on the one hand, and the omnipotence of the Creator on the other, it could not seem incredible to any that God should raise the dead. (Acts xxvi. 8.)

How sublime an idea does our Lord give us of the happiness of those who shall be thought worthy to attain it! They shall be equal to...
to the angels! Adored be the riches of that grace which redeems us from this degenerate and miserable state, in which we had made ourselves so much like the beasts that perish (Psal. xlix. 12.) to raise us to so high a dignity, and marshal us with the armies of heaven!

34 Let us esteem so glorious a hope aright, and with the greatest intenseness of soul pursue and insure it. And as for those enjoyments of this present world, which are suited only to the mortality and imperfection of it, let us moderate our regards to them, and cultivate those higher entertainments with the most solicitous care, which will be transplanted into the paradise of God, and ever flourish for the delight of his immortal children.

37 Christ, we see, argues a very important point of doctrine from premises, in which, perhaps, we might not have been able to have discovered it without such a hint. Let us learn to judge of scripture arguments, not merely by the sound, but by the sense of the words. And as our Lord chose a passage from the Pentateuch, rather than from the prophets, for the conviction of the Sadducees, let us be engaged to study the tempers, and even the prejudices, of those with whom we converse; that we may, if possible, let in the light of Divine truth on their hearts on that side by which they seem most capable of receiving it.

In a word, let us with pleasure think of the blessed God under that gracious title by which he manifested himself to Moses at the bush. Still he is the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; the God of our pious ancestors, the God of all our departed friends who are now sleeping in Jesus; for all their souls now live unto him, and their bodies shall ere long be awakened by him. In like manner, if we are followers of them who through faith and patience are now inheriting the promises, when we are gathered to our fathers, and our names, perhaps, forgotten among succeeding generations, he will still be our God. He will shew us, by the blessed experience of eternity, that when he treated with us by that title, and admitted us into the covenant by which he bears it, he intended for us something far nobler and better than the transient scenes of earth and of time could admit.

SECT.
Christ discourses of the first and great command of the law, and confounds the Pharisees with a question relating to David’s calling the Messiah his Lord. Mat. XXII. 34, to the end. Mark XII. 28—37. Luke XX. 41—44.

MAT. XXII. 34.

Thus Jesus defended the great doctrine of the resurrection from the vain caitles which were brought against it. But the debates of the day ended not here; for when the Pharisees heard that he had thus silenced and confounded the Sadducees, they were soon gathered together again, with a malicious view of carrying on the same design, to try if they could any way expose him to the people, and to make their remarks upon what he might say.

And one of the learned scribes [who was] also a doctor of the law, came with the rest; and having attended to the discourse between Jesus and the Sadducees, and heard them reasoning together, perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him a farther question; intending to make another trial of him as to his understanding in the sacred books; and said to him, Master, I desire thou wouldst inform me which is the first [and] great commandment of all that are contained in the whole law? Is it a ceremonial, or a moral precept, that is the most important, and deserves the preference?

And Jesus answered him, The question thou hast put may easily be resolved; for surely the first, that is, the most comprehensive and important of all the commandments of the law, [is] that which is contained in Deut. vi. 4, 5. x. 12. "Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God is the one great

35 Then one [of the scribes, which was a lawyer, came and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well] asked him a question tempting him, and saying, [Mark xii. 28.]

a Which is the first and great commandment, &c. This was a point that often was disputed by the Jewish doctors; some contending for the law of circumcision, others for that of sacrifices, and others for that of the phylacteries. And though it was a rule among them, that the law of the sabbath, was to give place to that of circumcision, yet they were not agreed as to the rest, which was the principal and most important precept, only in general they were inclined to give the preference to the ceremonial part.—Dr. Lightfoot remarks (in his Hor. Hebr. on Mark xii. 28,) that Christ answers the scribe out of a sentence which was written in the phylacteries; in which he avoided all occasion of offence, and plainly shewed (as the scribe afterwards observes, Mark xii. 35,) that the observance of the moral law was more acceptable to God than all the sacrifices they could offer to him.

great and only Lord: And upon all occasions thou shalt regard and honour him as such, and love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength;” that is, thou shalt consecrate to him all the united powers and faculties of thy nature; and thy understanding and will, thine affections and executive powers, shall be all in the most vigorous manner employed in his service. (See note c on Luke x. 27. sect. evii.) This is the first and great commandment, the principal and fundamental precept of the law, and there is no other which may not be considered in its degree as subordinate to this, and reducible to it. And the second, in its sublime and comprehensive nature, [is] much like unto it, as well as given by the same authority b, [even] this contained in Lev. xix. 18. “Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;” For all the duties you owe to your fellow-creatures may be reduced to this; and where this undissembled and generous principle of love is, the rest will easily and naturally follow. On the whole, therefore, there is no other commandment greater than these. And indeed I may say, that all the law and the prophets depend upon these two commandments: that is, it is the design of the whole revelation, in its different periods and circumstances, to promote that virtuous and holy temper which may be expressed by the love of God and our neighbour.

And the scribe who had proposed the question with a design to try him, was struck with the solidity and spirit of his answer, and said to him, Truly thou deservest to be owned as a Master in Israel: for thou hast spoken to this important question excellently well: for there is indeed one God, and there is no other beside him: And to love him, as thou hast said, with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, to consecrate all the

b The second is like unto it.] By quoting this with the former he sufficiently guarded against a foolish notion, which some say the Pharisees had, that the observation of one excellent precept of the law would excuse the transgression of many others. It is certain the Pharisees were ready to magnify duties of the first table, to the neglect of those of the second; on which account it was exceedingly proper to use such language as this.

the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

MATE. XXII. 41. [And] while the Pharisees were gathered together [while he taught in the temple] Jesus asked them, saying, How say the scribes, that Christ is the Son of David? Mark xii. 35. Luke xx. 41—42 What think ye of Christ? whose Son is he? They say unto him, The Son of David,

4 How then does David himself by the Holy Spirit, &c.] Our Lord, we see, always takes it for granted, in his arguments with the Jews, that the writers of the Old Testament were under such an extraordinary guidance of the Holy Spirit as to express themselves with the strictest propriety on all occasions. (Compare John x. 35. sect. cxxxiv.) And I look on this as no contemptible argument for the inspiration of the New Testament; for we can never think the apostles of Christ to have been less assisted by the Divine Spirit in their writings, when they were in other respects so much more powerfully endowed with it.

And whether the Pharisees were gathered together during this conference, expecting to have found an opportunity to ensnare him, as he was still teaching the people in the temple, Jesus turned to the scribes and doctors of the law who were present, and asked them, saying, How say the scribes so commonly as they do, that the Messiah is the Son of David? Let me ask you of that profession who are now here, What think ye concerning the Messiah in this respect? Whose Son is he? They say unto him, Nothing can be plainer than what thou representest as the general opinion: he is undoubtedly to be [the Son] of David. He saith unto them, How then does David himself, speaking by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in the book of Psalms, acknowledge him to be superior to himself, and call him Lord? for you cannot but know that there is a passage expressly to this purpose, (Psal. cx. 1) which you readily allow to refer to the Messiah, in which you find David saying, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand in exalted power and glory, with all the majesty and honour of a King, till I make all thine enemies thy footstool, and cause thee to trample upon

Mat. XXII. 33.
Reflections on the command to love God and our neighbour.

Upon them at pleasure.” If David himself therefore call him Lord, and speak of him as his superior, as you see he doth, how is he then his Son?

Now as the scribes and Pharisees were ignorant of the great doctrine of the Divine nature of the Messiah, with respect to which, even before his incarnation, he was the Lord of David, and of the whole church, they were quite confounded with the question. And the vast crowd of common people that was about him heard him with great pleasure. And all his adversaries were at such a loss, that no man could answer him so much as a word; neither did any one presume from that day forward, to ask him any more such ensnaring questions as those by which they had now contrived to assault, and, if possible, to confound him.

Improvement.

Mark xii. 28.

Whatever might be the design of the scribe in putting this question to Christ again (which was in effect the same with what another had proposed before, (Luke x. 25, sect. civ.) we have reason to rejoice in the repetition of so important an answer, Oh that it might be inscribed on our hearts as with the point of a diamond!

29. The first and great commandment requires us to love the Lord our God, with all our heart, and soul, and mind, and strength; and the second, which is like unto it, to love our neighbour as ourselves. But alas, what reason have we to complain of our own deficiency on both these heads! and how much need of being taught again even these first principles of the oracles of God! (Heb. v. 12.)

30. Can we say, with regard to the first, that the blessed God has the whole of our hearts? Is the utmost vigour of our faculties exerted in his service? Do we make him the end of all our actions, of all our wishes, of all our pursuits?—Or are we indeed such equitable judges between ourselves and others as the second of these

e If David himself therefore call him Lord, how is he then his Son? This implies both the existence of David in a future state, and the authority of the Messiah over that invisible world into which that prince was removed by death. Else, how great a Monarch soever the Messiah might have been, he could not have been properly called David’s Lord, any more than Julius Cesar could have been called the Lord of Romulus, because he reigned in Rome 700 years after his death, and vast ly extended the bounds of that empire which Romulus founded.——Munster’s Note on this text shews, in a very forcible manner, the wretched expedients of some modern Jews to evade the force of that interpretation of the icht Psalm which refers it to the Messiah.

f Presume from that day forward to ask him any more questions.] The plain meaning is, they asked him no more such copious questions; for the memory of this confusion impressed their minds during the short remainder of Christ’s continuance among them; and he was soon removed from them, so that they had no farther opportunities of doing it when that impression wore off.

those allowances for others which we expect or desire they should make for us?—Surely we must own we are far from having yet attained, or from being already perfect. (Phil. iii. 12)—But if this be not in the main the prevailing and governing temper of our minds, in vain are our burnt-offerings and our sacrifices; in vain are all the solemnities of public worship, or the forms of domestic and secret devotion; and by all our most pathetic expressions of duty to God, and friendship to men, we do but add one degree of guilt to another. Let us then most earnestly entreat that God would have mercy upon us, and by his Holy Spirit write these laws in our hearts.

On these subjects let scribes instructed to the kingdom of heaven insist, lest they be condemned by this expositor of the Jewish law. And let those whose notions are thus wisely regulated, take heed, lest, while they seem near to the kingdom of God, by resting in mere notions, they come short of it, and sink into a ruin aggravated by their near approach to the confines of salvation and glory.

As for that question of Christ with which the Pharisees were perplexed, the gospel has given us a key to it. Well might David, in spirit, call him Lord, who according to the flesh was to descend from his loins; for before David or Abraham was he is. (John xvi. 58.) Let us adore this mysterious union of the Divine and human natures in the person of our glorious Emmanuel; and be very careful that we do not oppose him, if we would not be found fighters against God. Already he is exalted at the right hand of the Father: let his friends rejoice in his dignity and glory, and with pleasure wait the day of his complete triumph, when all his enemies shall be put under his feet, and even the last of them be swallowed up in victory. (1 Cor. xv. 25, 54.)

SECT. CLVII.

Christ discourses with the Pharisees in the temple, repeating the charges and cautions which he had formerly advanced at the house of one of that sect. Mat. XXIII. 1—22. Mark XII. 38—40. Luke XX. 45, to the end.

Mat. XXIII. 1. Then spake Jesus... Luke, in the audience of all the people, unto his

Mat. XXIII. 1. Then Jesus, in the progress of his doctrine and discourse, spake to his disciples in the audience of all the people who were present, and took occasion (as he had done formerly, Luke xi. 39, & seq. sect. cx.) to expose and caution them

...them against the pride and hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees, saying openly and freely to them, The scribes and the Pharisees sit in the chair of Moses, and are the public teachers and expounders of his law: All therefore whatsoever they shall charge you to observe in virtue of that law, pay a becoming deference and regard to, and be ready to observe and do accordingly; *but practise not by any means according to their works: for they say well in many instances, but do not themselves practise according to what they teach.\footnote{Mark xii. 38. Luke xx. 45.}

I therefore repeat it again, Beware of imitating the hypocrisy, and following the example, of the scribes; For by virtue of the traditions which in conjunction with the Pharisees they have added to the law, they bind together grievous and insupportable burdens, and without the least remorse lay them on men's shoulders, urging them by the heaviest penalties to conform to all their injunctions; but they dispense with themselves in the neglect of many of them, and will not so much as move them with a finger of theirs. (Compare Luke xi. 45, sect. cx.)

And even when they do conform in other instances to their own rules, it is generally from a bad principle; for there is none of all their works unto his disciples,\footnote{Mark xii. 38. Luke xx. 45.}

2 Saying, The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat:

3 All therefore, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not.

\footnote{Mark XII. 38. Beware of the scribes: [Luke xx. 46.]}

4 For they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers.

5 But all their works they do for to be seen of men: they make broad their phylacteries, and

...sit in the chair of Moses.] Some think here is an allusion to those pulpits which Ezra made for the expounders of the law (Neh. viii. 4) and which were afterwards continued in the synagogue, from whence the rabbies delivered their discourses sitting. It is probably called Moses' chair, because it was that from whence the books of Moses were read and explained; so that he seemed to dictate from thence. It is strange that Lightfoot (Har. Heb. in loc.) and Gussatus, should explain this of a legislative authority; since the scribes and Pharisees, as such, had no peculiar authority of that kind.

In virtue of that law, if this limitation be not supposed, this passage will be inconsistent with all those in which he condemns the doctrines of the scribes and Pharisees. Had he meant (as Orobio, and some Popish writers have unaccountably pretended) to assert their infallibility, and to require an absolute submission to their dictates, he must have condemned himself, as it was known he was rejected by them. See Lindburch, Collat. Amic. p. 58, 114.

* Beware of the scribes.] This word scribe in general signifies any one conversant about books and writings; and is sometimes put for a civil officer, whose business probably resembled that of a Secretary of state (2 Sam. viii. 17. 1 Kings iv. 5. 2 Kings xix. 2.) at other times it is used at large for a man of learning and ability (1 Chron. xxvii. 22. Jer. xxxvi. 26. Ezra vii. 6. Mat. xxiii. 34. 1 Cor. i. 20.) But as biblical learning was most esteemed among the Jews, the word in the New Testament seems to be chiefly appropriated to those that applied themselves to the study of the law (perhaps including those whose business it was to transcribe it.) Of these the public professors, who read lectures upon it, were called doctors, or lawyers; and, probably, they who were invested with some public offices in the sanhedrim, or other courts, scribes of the people (Mat. ii. 4.)—But that the scribes, as Trigland labours to prove (de Secta Keveror. p. 68) were kanaiters, or textuaries, who rejected those traditions which the Pharisees inculcated, seems, from this text especially, utterly improbable. Our Lord commonly joins them with the Pharisees, and probably most of them were of that sect.

works but what they chiefly do with a design to be viewed and taken notice of by men, as examples of extraordinary piety. For this purpose, in particular, they make their phylactery remarkably broad

\footnote{They make their phylacteries remarkably broad.}^d, that it may be thought they write more of the law on those scrolls of parchment than others do, or desire to be more frequently reminded of Divine things by the size of them; and, for the same reason likewise, they make the fringes and tassels, which the law requires them to wear on the borders of their garments as large as may be, that they may seem peculiarly desirous to remember the Divine commandments whenever they look upon them. (Compare Numb. xii. 38—40.)

These are the self-conceited and vain glorious men, who affect to walk in long garments, that they may appear with an air of distinguished gravity and stateliness; \textit{And love the uppermost places at feasts}, where guests of the first quality are used to sit; \textit{and are ambitious to secure the highest seats even in the very synagogues}, where they should meet to prostrate themselves in the Divine presence with the lowest abasement of soul: \textit{And, on the same principle of vain-glory and ostentation, they desire to receive salutations in the markets, and other places of common concourse (compare Luke xi. 43. sect. cx.) and to be called by men, Rabbi, rabbi\textsuperscript{1}; a title of honour with this title, which was derived from \textit{rabb}, a word which signifies both magnificence and multitude, and seems intended very emphatically to express both the greatness and the variety of that learning which they who bore it were supposed to be possessed of \textit{(1.\textsuperscript{Enfant's Intro. p. 98.)—Dr. Lightfoot tells us (Hor. Heb. in loc.) that the words of the scribes are declared to be more amiable and weighty than those of the prophets, and equal to those of the law: so that Gamaliel advised to get a rabbi, that one might no longer doubt of any thing. More passages to this purpose may be seen in Dr. Gale's \\textit{Sermons}, Vol. i. p. 89, and in Whity and Elmer, in loc. They fully show the necessity there was for such repeated cautions as our Lord gives, and are an abundant answer to what Oratio objects to our Lord's conduct in this respect (see Limbarch. Collat. p. 119); for, considering their inveterate prejudices against Christ, it could never be supposed that the common people would receive the gospel till such corrupt teachers as these were brought into a just disgrace.} honour which they are fond of having repeated in every sentence, and almost at every word.

But as for you, my disciples, be not you called Rabbi, nor value yourselves on the name, if it should ever happen to be given you: for one is your Master, (even) Christ; and ye are all brethren, and as such should treat each other with a loving freedom and familiarity. And call not [any one] on earth your father, but be fond of receiving this title from men, who may be ready to speak of themselves as but children in comparison of you, and implicitly to follow all your dictates; for one is your Father, and that of the whole family, (even) he who dwells in the highest heaven, and before whom all the most distinguished honours of the children of men disappear, as less than nothing and vanity. Neither be ye called masters and guides; for one is your great Master and Instructor, (even) Christ, whose dictates you are ever to receive, and in whose name and authority alone you are to teach others. But, on the contrary, he that is, and would appear in the eyes of God to be, the greatest among you, shall be most eminent for condescension and humility, and will be ready to wait on the rest, and to behave himself on all occasions as your servant. (Compare Mat. xx. 26, 27. p. 155.) And what I have often told you will assuredly be found to be a certain truth, That whosoever shall attempt in an ambitious way to exalt himself, shall sooner or later, by one method or another, be abased; and whosoever, on the other hand, shall humble himself, shall be exalted to the highest honour.

Then Jesus, turning from his disciples, to whom

Rabbi, Rabbi. [Mark xii. 36. Luke xx. 46.]

But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.

And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father which is in heaven.

Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ.

But he that is greatest among you, shall be your servant.

And whosoever shall exalt himself, shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself, shall be exalted.

But we unto you scribes

Ye are all brethren.] It is observable, that not one word is said of Peter's authority over the rest, either here, or on the application made by Zebedee's children; though had such an authority been intended, nothing could have been more natural, or necessary, than to have mentioned and adjusted it. Compare note on Mat. xx. 26. p. 155.

Call not [any one] on earth your father.] The Pharisees, no doubt, had this title given them; and Bishop Wilkins observes, that it is a title which assuming priests of all religious have greatly affected.

One is your Master, (even) Christ.] It is remarkable that this occurs twice in the very same words (here, and in ver. 8.) Our Lord knew how requisite it would be to attend to it, and how ready even his ministers would be to forget it.

Whosoever shall exalt himself, &c.] Christ seems by the frequent repetition of this maxim to intimate that he intended it, not only for those who were to be teachers of others, but for all his disciples without exception. And it is well worthy of our observation that no one sentence of our Lord's is so frequently repeated as this; which occurs at least ten times in the gospels. Compare Mat. xviii. 4. xx. 26. 27. xxii. 10, 11. Mark ix. 35. x. 43. 44. Luke xiv. 11, xvii. 14. xxii. 28, and John xiii. 14.

scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in.

whom he had hitherto been speaking, addressed himself boldly to those crafty enemies who stood around him, waiting for nothing but an opportunity of mischief, and said, \( \text{Wo unto you, ye scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!} \) for by the prejudices you are so zealous to propagate among the people, you shut up the kingdom of heaven against men, and do all you can to prevent their regarding it: for you neither go in yourselves, nor permit them that are awakened to a desire of entering, to go in; and thus you make yourselves in some degree chargeable with their destruction as well as with your own, by the false notions you instil into their minds, and the prejudices you raise against me and my doctrine. (Compare Luke xi. 52, sect. cx.)

\( \text{Wo unto you, ye scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!, that impose upon men by specious forms of devotion! but these forms cannot impose upon God, nor prevent his vengeance from falling heavy upon you: for, by your cruel extortions you devour the houses of widows and orphans, whose helpless circumstances, if you had any remains of humanity and generosity, might rather engage you to protect and vindicate them; and it is only for a pretence to cover these crying immoralities, that you make such long and seemingly earnest prayers, hoping thereby to engage the esteem and confidence of others, that you may have the greater opportunity to injure and defraud them: but this complicated wickedness shall cost you dear; for therefore shall you receive greater and more dreadful damnation, than if you had never prayed at all, nor made any pretences to religion.} \)
Wo unto you, ye blind guides, who have invented so many nice distinctions, to make men easy in their sins, and subservient to your secular interests! who say, for instance, Whosoever shall swear only by the temple, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gift of the temple, whether by that with which a part of it is overlaid, or by that which is laid up in its treasures, he is obliged by it. Ye foolish and blind [creatures], is not the stupid sophistry of this distinction apparent to the weakest understanding? for which of these is greater, the gift, or the temple that sanctifies the gold, which without its relation to the temple would have nothing in it more sacred than any common metal? And ye also say, just with the same degree of sense and piety as before, Whosoever shall swear only by the altar of God, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gift which is upon it, he is obliged to the performance of his oath. Ye foolish and blind [creatures], what an idle and senseless distinction is this: for which can you suppose is greater the gift, or the altar that sanctifies the gift, which, before it was brought thither, was only a common thing, and might be used to any of the ordinary purposes of human life? The truth of the case is therefore plain and obvious: he that sweareth by the altar, sweareth in effect by it, and by all the things that are offered upon it to him whose altar it is: And he that sweareth by the temple, sweareth by it, and by him also that dwells in it, even the eternal and ever-blessed Jehovah, who honours it in a special manner with the tokens of his presence: And he that sweareth by heaven, which some of you are foolish enough to think a little oath, sweareth by the throne of the most high God, and by him who sits upon it, and fills all the train of attendant angels with the humblest reverence and prostration of mind. Now did you and your disciples consider this, that every oath by a creature is an implicit appeal to God, you could not surely talk of such expressions in so light and dangerous a manner as you commonly do.

16 Wo unto you, ye blind guides! which say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor.

17 Ye fools, and blind: for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold?

18 And whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing: but whosoever sweareth by the gift that is upon it, he is guilty.

19 Ye fools, and blind: for whether is greater the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift?

20 Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar sweareth by it and by all things therein.

21 And whoso shall swear by the temple, sweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein.

22 And he that shall swear by heaven sweareth by the throne of God, and by him that sitteth thereon.

m Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing.] It seems the Pharisees taught, that oaths by the creatures might be used on trifling occasions, and violated without any great guilt (see note h on Mat. v. 34 Vol. I. p. 213.) But they excepted oaths by the corn, and by sacrifices; in which, it is plain that, without any regard to common sense or decency, they were influenced merely by a view to their own interest; and therefore represented these to the people as things of more eminent sanctity than even the temple or altar itself.
As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprove upon an obedient ear (Prov. xxv. 12). Christ was indeed a wise and faithful Reprover; but the ears of these Pharisees were disobedient and uncircumcised. Let us, however, who are his disciples, attend to these instructions of our heavenly Master, and avoid every thing which has the remotest tendency to what he here condemns with so just a severity.

Let not our zeal spend itself upon the externals of religion. Let us not impose heavy burdens upon each other; nor lay down rules for the conduct of others, by which we do not in like circumstances think fit to govern ourselves. Let us not impose our own decisions in a magisterial manner upon our fellow Christians, nor affect to be called fathers, masters, and teachers; remembering that Christ alone is our Master, and God our Father, and that it is a dangerous presumption and folly to set ourselves in the place of either. Let us be upon our guard against that vain ostentation that would lead us to place any part of our happiness in precedence, and to value ourselves upon our rank, or upon airy titles of honour, by which, perhaps rather by accident than merit, we are distinguished from others; and which to a truly wise man, and especially to a humble follower of Jesus, will appear to be a very little matter. Let us desire that honour which arises from condescending to others, and serving them in love; that honour which springs from the Divine approbation, which it will be impossible to secure without unaffected piety. (John v. 44.)

God forbid that our devotions should ever be intended as a cloak of maliciousness, or as the instrument of serving any mean and vile purpose! Such prayers would return in curses on our own heads, and draw down on them aggravated damnation. God forbid that we should spend that time, and that ardency of spirit, in making proselytes to our own peculiar notions and party, which ought to be laid out in making them the servants of God through Christ! God forbid that we should delude ourselves or others by such idle distinctions in matters of conscience, as these which our blessed Redeemer has with so much reason and spirit exposed!

Let us retain the greatest reverence for an oath, and not custom ourselves to trifle with any thing which looks like it. Let us consider heaven as the throne of God, and often think of the majesty and glory of that illustrious Being that sits thereon; for a sense of his continual presence will form us to a better temper, and engage us with a righteousness far exceeding that of the scribes and Pharisees, to walk before him in all his commandments and ordinances blameless.
Christ continues his discourse with the Pharisees, reproving them for their hypocrisy, and threatening them with approaching judgments. Mat. XXIII. 23, to the end.

MAT. XXIII. 23.

Our Lord farther proceeded in his discourse and said, Wo unto you, ye scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! ye are careful to tithe 23 mint, and anise, and cummin, and every other common herb which grows in your gardens; and yet have wholly neglected the weightier matters of the law, justice, and mercy, and fidelity: these should chiefly have been regarded by you as what ye ought more especially to have practised, and indeed not to have omitted the other, as a reverter observance is due even to the least of God's commandments. (Compare Luke xi. 24-42, sect. cx.) Ye blind guides of blind and wretched followers, who do (as it is proverbially said) carefully strain out a gnat from the liquor you are going to drink, and yet can swallow down a camel; you affect to scruple little things, and disregard those of the greatest moment.

25 Wo unto you, ye scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye cleanse the outside of the cup and of the dish, and are mighty exact in the observance of external rites and washings of the body; but are regardless of the inner parts, and unconcerned about your hearts and consciences, which are full of uncleanness, and of all kinds of rapine and intemperance. (Compare Luke xi. 39, 39 sect. cx.) Thou blind and senseless Pharisee first begin with the heart, and thereby, as it were cleanse

* Fidelity.] The word πίστις; has undoubtedly this signification in many places (compare Tit. ii. 10; Gal. v. 22; and Rom. iii. 3). But there are many more in which it signifies the confidence reposed in another; and it is of great importance to observe this. See Col. i. 4; and 1 Pet. i. 21.

b Strain out a gnat, and swallow down a camel.] In those hot countries, as Serrarius well observes. (Tithares, p. 51), gnats were apt to fall into wine, if it were not carefully covered; and passing the liquor through a strainer, that no gnat, or part of one, might remain, grew into a proverb for exactness about little matters.—Could any authority be produced in which xenia signifies a large insect, I should with great pleasure follow the translation of 1727, in rendering the latter clause, swallow a beetle.

They are compared to whitened sepulchres.

which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also.

Wo unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whitened sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.

Wo unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye resemble whitened sepulchres, which indeed appear fair and beautiful without, but within are full of the bones of the dead, and of all that uncleanness which arises from their putrefying bodies. Even so you also do indeed outwardly appear righteous unto men, who view nothing more than the external part of your character; but in the sight of an heart-searching God, who has a clear and perfect view of all that lies within, you are full of that hypocrisy and iniquity which is infinitely more loathsome to him than the most disagreeable objects can be to the human eye.

And ye 30 say, If we had been living in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the holy prophets which they shed, but would have treated them in another manner than our fathers did. So that ye 31 really bear witness to yourselves, that ye are the sons of those holy men; which, as Elnair (Vol. I. p. 160) and Raphelius (Anno. cr. Xen. p. 49) show, was a piece of respect which most nations have paid to persons of distinguished merit, especially to those that fell in a good cause. What Vitringa (de Synag. p. 221) tells us of the extraordinary honours paid to the sepulchre of Mordecai, is an agreeable illustration of these words. Josephus also, from Nicolaus Damascenus, mentions Herod's repairing in a very splendid manner the sepulchre of David, (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 7 (al. 11), § 1.) Compare Acts ii. 29.—Grotius is certainly right in saying that the four verses in this paragraph are to be considered as one sentence; of which perhaps ver. 31 may be a parenthesis.

sons of those that murdered the prophets; and indeed your present temper and conduct more certainly speaks you to be their genuine offspring, and to be full of that very malignity which you pretend to condemn in them. (Compare Luke xi. 47, 48. sect. cx.) And do you [then] fill up, as soon as you think fit, what yet remains to be completed of the measure of your fathers' sins, that wrath may come upon this guilty land to the uttermost.

Ye painted and deceitful serpents, ye brood of specious, but venemous and mischievous, vipers, how artfully soever you may evade human censures, how can you so much as hope, by any of these vain pretences, to escape what is infinitely more dreadful, that righteous sentence of the unerring Judge which will consign you over to the damnation of hell? (Compare Mat. iii. 7. Vol. I. p. 99.)

Therefore, behold I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes instructed to the kingdom of heaven, to try you once more, and to give you the last call to repentance and reformation which you must ever expect: but I know that this last attempt will, with regard to the generality of you, be entirely in vain; and that [some] of them ye will kill, and carry your malice so far as to crucify them like common slaves; and when ye cannot effect that, [some] of them ye will scourge in your synagogues, and persecute [them] from city to city. For thus will God in righteous judgment permit you to act, that ye may become the distinguished trophies of his displeasure, as if he were reckoning with you for the guilt of all former ages? so that upon you may seem to come the vengeance due for all the righteous blood which has been pored forth on the earth from the beginning of the world; even from the blood of Abel, that eminently righteous man, whom his brother Cain then slew, to the blood of Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, one of the children of them which killed the prophets.

Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers.

Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell.

Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes; and some of them ye shall kill and crucify, and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city.

That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of...

of Zecharias, son of Barachia, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar.

36 Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation.

37 O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!

To the blood of Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, &c.] Though very learned men have interpreted this of four different persons, I do not, with the learned and candid Witsius (Misc. Vol. I. p. 269), think it an inexplicable difficulty which of these is referred to. I scruple not, with Grothus, Drusius, Casianbon, Erasmus, and many more, to explain it of that Zechariah which is expressly said to have been slain in that remarkable manner between the temple and the altar (2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21), though I take not upon me to determine whether (as Chrysostom asserts) Jehoiada his father was also called Barachiah, which signifies one that blesses the Lord, as Jehoiada does one that confuses him; or whether the original reading was different from ours, as Jerom says he found in the gospel of the Nazarens, or the Hebrew version of Matthew.—It is by no means necessary, with Cappellus, to allow that it was a slip in the evangelist's memory; but much more decent to suppose it an officious addition of some early transcriber, who might confound this martyr with Zechariah, one of the twelve minor prophets, who was indeed the son of Baruch, but who does not by any means appear to have been murdered; nor is there any reason to imagine the Jews, so soon after their return from captivity, would have attempted so flagitious an act.—Though Theophylact understands the text of Zechariah the father of John the Baptist, on the credit of an idle tale of Origen's, confuted by Jerom, in which he tells us that this good man was murdered in the temple (see Erasmus, in loc.), he has had few followers; and indeed the story seems to have been made on the mistaken authority of the text in question.—Yet after all it seems still more unreasonable, with Archbishop Tillwood (Vol. I. p. 197, 198), to understand these words as a prophecy of that Zechariah, the son of Baruch, who, as Josephus says (Bell. Jud. lib. iv. cap. 5. (al. v. 1.) § 4,) was assassinated in the middle of the temple, just before the Romans besieged the city. Had we more evidence of his being a righteous man, it would be harsh to suppose Christ in such a connection to speak of a future fact as what was already done; or to charge that deed on the whole Jewish nation which was done, contrary to the decree of the sanhedrim, by two resolute villains. All the martyrs from Abel to Zechariah, seem to have been a proverb; and it might naturally arise from observing that Abel was the first, and Zechariah in Chronicles the last eminently good man, of whose murder the scripture speaks.

yet ye would not hearken to my compassionate calls, but have hardened your hearts against my love, and repaid me with contempt, hatred, and persecution? Behold, the time is coming when you will see your folly, though too late; for your sacred house, in which you vainly trust, even this magnificent temple in which you now stand, is so near being utterly destroyed, that it may be said to be even already left desolate to you, so that the few who survive the general carnage shall be forced to sit down and weep over its ruins. For I am now making my last visit here, and I say unto you, That henceforth, since you treat me so ill, ye shall not see me any more, till even ye shall say, as the multitudes lately did but with sublimer passions and nobler views, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; that is, till your calamities have taught you eagerly to wish for the Messiah, and Divine grace shall have inclined you, as a nation, gladly to receive me under that character; but you little think through what scenes of desolation, exile, and misery, you must pass for succeeding ages, before that happy time comes. Compare Luke xiii. 34, 35, p. 18, 19.) And when he had thus spoken he went out of the temple.

IMPROVEMENT.

Mat. xxiii. 25 26 May we ever remember how necessary it is that our righteousness should exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, if we desire to enter into the kingdom of heaven! (Mat. v. 20.) May our zeal be employed on the great essentials of religion, justice, mercy, and fidelity, and not be laid out merely or chiefly on the circumstantial of it!

25, 26 May we be concerned about the purity of our hearts, and not merely attend to the decency of our external behaviour! May we be,

Till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh, &c.] This was doubtless spoken after Christ's triumphant entrance into Jerusalem (though Heinsius most unnaturally supposes it transplanted), which shews the necessity of giving the words some such turn as they have in the paraphrase.—If we might be allowed, with Grotius, to translate vad a veritate, till ye would be glad to say, or wish you had said, Blessed is he that cometh, &c. this would give a very plain and easy sense, nearly parallel to Mat. xxvi. 64, where a' a' is perhaps used in the same sense. And thus the words might be explained as if our Lord had said, "From the time of my present appearance at this passover, you shall not see me any more, till that awful hour of judgment, in which I shall appear in such pomp and power, that the proudest of you all shall have reason to wish you had cordially joined in those Hosannas which you lately rebuked." This interpretation, could the version be justified, I should vastly prefer to any other.
Jesus commends the liberality of the poor widow.

be, not like painted sepulchres, fair and beautiful without, and full of all uncleanness within; but rather like the vessel laid up before the Lord, whose outside shone with polished gold, while within it was replenished with heavenly manna! (Heb. ix. 4.)

How many, like these Pharisees, condemn persecution, and yet 29—32 themselves are chargeable with the guilt of it! May that never be our character, lest we be judged out of our own mouths, and lest we thereby fill up the measure of our iniquities!

Behold the repeated tenderness of our compassionate Redeemer even towards that guilty city that killed the prophets, and stoned the messengers of God! He would with the gentlest and most solicitous care have gathered them, even as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings! Thus does he still call and invite perishing sinners. Oh that the obstinacy of their own perverse and rebellious wills may not finally withstand all the overtures of his grace; lest eternal desolation be their portion, and they in vain wish for the repetition of those calls which they once so wantonly despised!

SECT. CLIX.

Christ applauds the liberality of the poor widow whom he saw casting her two mites into the treasury. Mark XII. 41, to the end. Luke XXI. 1—4.

Mark XII. 41. And Jesus sat over-against the treasury: and he looked up: and beheld how the people cast money [and their gifts] into the treasury: and many that were rich cast in much. [Luke xxii. 1.]

Mark XII. 41. And Jesus, having made an end of his discourse to the scribes and Pharisees, as he was going out of the temple, sat down at a little distance, over-against that part of it which was called the treasury, because there the chests for collecting the contributions of the people stood, and in the chambers over that cloyster the sacred stores were kept; and he looked up, and beheld, with attentive observation, how the people cast their money [and] brought their offerings and free gifts, into the treasury, at this public time; and many rich men cast in much; there being still this remainder of national goodness among them, though true religion was sunk to so very low an ebb.

And there came among the rest a certain poor widow, whose character and circumstances he well knew; and she cast in there two of the smallest

And our Lord was so pleased with this generous action of hers, that he took particular notice of it, and even called his disciples to him, to hear his remarks upon it; and as they stood about him, he says to them, Look upon yonder woman, and observe the greatness of her piety and zeal; for assuredly I say unto you, That this poor widow, however she may seem to men to have given but a very little inconsiderable matter, has appeared in the sight of God to have cast in more than all they who have thrown such sumptuous gifts into the treasury: And, in proportion to her circumstances, it is much more; for all these, who had presented such large sums, threw in, comparatively, but a little part of their superfluity and redundancy of possessions into the offerings of God; but she, in the midst of her poverty, and the daily straits to which she is exposed, has cast in all the little stock of money, that she had [even all] that she had by her for her living; not knowing where she should get the next mite for herself to furnish out the necessary supports for her humble and indigent life.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ had his eye on those who were bringing their gifts unto the sacred treasury. Let us remember his eye is also upon us, to observe in what degree we are ready, on proper occasions, to contribute for the glory of God and the good of mankind; and in what proportion to the ability which God has given us. Let not the poorest be discouraged from doing something for these good purposes, however little they may have it in their power to perform; since Christ may acknowledge the noblest charity in the smallest gift, as wherever there is a willing mind, it is accepted according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not. (2 Cor. viii. 12.)

Let us imitate the candour of our blessed Redeemer, and be ready to be pleased with little services. The circumstances of mankind are such, that few have it in their power to do great matters frequently for the service of others: but the desire of a man is his kindness, (Prov. xix. 22.) the principles and circumstances of an action recommend it more than the appearance it may make; and a multiplicity of little kind offices, in persons frequently conversant with each other, are the bands of society and friendship.
friendship. We ought therefore to preserve an habitual tenderness and generosity of mind, and be mutually willing to oblige and to be oblied by them.

To conclude; let us not despise the poor, since there are many of them who will in Christ's computation be found eminently rich in good works; many whose mite will, in the treasury of God, have the value of a talent, and will condemn the sordid parsimony with which many of the rich and great have cast their presents into it; while what the latter part with out of their abundance bears no proportion in the account of God to what the former freely spare from their necessity. Happy is it for every truly pious and benevolent mind that it is to give up its final account to him who searches the heart, and who is witness to those devout and charitable purposes which will always stretch themselves out beyond the limit of actions, and engage the charitable soul to wish more good than the power and revenues even of kingdoms could effect.

SECT. CLX.

AND Jesus went out, and departed from the temple; and his disciples came to him for to shew him the buildings of the temple: [Luke, and as some spake how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts,] [one of them saith unto him, Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here.] [Mark xiii. 1. Luke xxi. 5.]

MAT. XXIV. 1.

AND when Jesus had thus confounded his adversaries, and had foretold the desolation that their aggravated sins would shortly bring both on the city and the temple, (Mat. xxiii. 38,) p. 236,) he left the place, and going out from thence, departed from the temple, where he had been discoursing to them. And as he was going away, his disciples came to [him], and took that occasion to shew him the splendid buildings and magnificent decorations of the temple: and some observing what a noble structure it was, and speaking how it was adorned with beautiful stones, of a prodigious size, and with costly gifts, which many persons, in accomplishment of their vows for deliverances received, had hung up on the walls and pillars of it, beside what was laid up in its treasures; one of [them] says unto him, a Beautiful stones of a prodigious size.] Josephus says that some of them were forty-five cubits long, five high, and six broad: (Bell. Jud. lib. v. cap. 5 (al vi. 6.) § 6.) See his large and beautiful description of the whole temple in that chapter, which is one of the most entertaining passages of such a kind I ever met with.

b Costly gifts, &c.] Hanging up such asanqueala, or consecrated gifts, was com-
Jesus foretells its approaching destruction.

And Jesus replying, said unto them, [As for these things which ye behold with so much admiration, do you not see the splendour and magnificence of all these great and pompous buildings which are the pride of the Jewish nation, and the wonder of all the rest of mankind? Yet notwithstanding all the present grandeur of this stately temple, verily I say unto you, That the days will quickly come, in which a victorious enemy shall profane its sanctity, and deface its beauty, insomuch that there shall not be left one single stone upon another here, that shall not be entirely demolished, till no remains of any part of it shall be preserved.

3 And when he was retired from the city, as he sat down upon the mount of Olives, which was over-against the temple, and commanded the finest prospects of it from the east, the disciples, Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, who were favoured with a peculiar share of his intimacy and confidence, came to him privately, saying, Master, we entreat thee that thou wouldst tell us when these awful things shall happen? and what [shall be] the sign of thy second coming when thou wilt execute thy vengeance on these thine enemies; and of the end of the present age and dispensation, when all these things shall be accomplished, mon in most of the ancient temples. Tacitus speaks of the immense opulence of the temple at Jerusalem; (Histor. lib. v. § 8.) Amongst others of its treasures there was a golden table given by Pompey; and several golden vases, of exquisite workmanship, as well an immense size (for Josephus tells us, in the chapter cited above, § 4, that they had chalices [askesiai], as tall as a man; which some have thought referred to God's representing the Jewish nation under the emblem of a vine; Is. v. 1, 7. Psal. lxxx. 8. Ezek. xv. 2, 6.) And Josephus likewise assures (ibid. § 6.) that the marble of the temple was so white that it appeared to one at a distance like a mountain of snow; and the gilding of several of its external parts, which he there mentions, must, especially when the sun shone upon it, render it a most splendid and beautiful spectacle.

There shall not be left one stone upon another, here, &c.] It seemed exceedingly improbable that this should happen in that age, considering the peace of the Jews with the Romans, and the strength of their citadel, which forced Titus himself to acknowledge that it was the singular hand of God which compelled them to relinquish fortifications which no human power could have conquered. (Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. vi cap. 9. al. vii. 16, § 1.) (Compare note b, on Luke xix. 4. p. 162.)—Bishop Chandler justly observes that no impostor would have foretold an event so unlikely, and so disagreeable. Defence of Christianity, p. 472, 473.

2 And Jesus [answering,] said unto them, [Luke, As for these things which ye behold,] See ye not all these [great buildings?] Verily I say unto you, [Luke, the days will come, in which there shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.] [Mark xiii. 2. Luke xxii. 6.]

3 And as he sat upon the mount of Olives (over-against the temple,) the disciples (Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew) came unto him privately, saying, [Luke, Master,] tell us when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and the end of the world, [when all these things shall be fulfilled?] Mark xiii.
first question in the former, and the second in the latter part of the chapter: though where the transition is made, has been, among those that embrace this interpretation, matter of much debate.—Others supposed the apostles took it for granted that the world was to be at an end when Jerusalem was destroyed; and that Christ was not solicitous to undeceive them, as their error might make them so much the more watchful; and therefore answers in ambiguous terms, which might suit either of these events. But it seems much more natural to conclude that they expected the wicked persecutors of Christ (in which number most of the magistrates and priests were) would by some signal judgment be destroyed; and that hereupon he would erect a most illustrious kingdom, and probably a more magnificent temple, which they might think described in Ezekiel; an expectation which they did not entirely quit even to the day of his ascension. (See Acts ii. 6.) Our Lord, with perfect integrity and consummate wisdom, gives them an account of the propheticating and confirmative signs of the destruction of Jerusalem; and then without saying one word of any temporal kingdom to be erected, raises their thoughts to the final judgment to which the figure used in the former description might many of them be literally applied) and sets before them an heavenly kingdom, and eternal life, as the great object of their pursuit, Mat. xxv. 34, 46. This I take to be the key to this whole discourse; the particular parts of which have been admirably illustrated by many learned commentators; but the whole scope and connection of it, so far as I can recollect, fully explained by none.

*Many shall come in my name, &c.] See Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 13. (al. 12) § 4, 5.—Christian writers have always with great reason represented Josephus's History of the Jewish War as the best commonagy on this chapter; and many have justly remarked it as a wonderful instance of the care of Providence for the Christian church, that he, an eye-witness, and in these things of so great credit, should (especially in such an extraordinary manner) be preserved, to transmit to us a collection of important facts, which so exactly illustrate this noble prophecy in almost every circumstance. (Compare Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. iii. cap. 8, (al. 14.) But as it would swell my notes too much to enter into a particular detail of these circumstances, I must content myself with referring to Dr. Whitby's excellent notes on the xxvith subject, and to Archbishop Tillotson's large and accurate discourse on the same subject, in the second volume of his Pathematic Works, Ser. 183.—187, p. 547, & seq.

The time is come. The word τηντις may signify either the approach or arrival of the time, and may with great propriety express the first opening of a scene to be gradually disclosed; in which sense it is applied to Christ's kingdom, as prophesied by himself and his apostles, during the time of his personal ministry.—Such pretended Messiahs did indeed arise towards the close of the Jewish state. (See 1 John iv. 1; Acts v. 36, 37; and Joseph. Antiq. Lib. xx. cap. 8, (al. 4, 7), § 6, 10.—The Rhemish Jesuits, as much as they triumph in their infallible guide to the interpretation of scripture, ridiculously explain this as a prophecy of Luther and Calvin; which I mention only as one instance, among many more, of their contemptible ignorance or wicked precarulation.
He mentions the calamities that would fore-run them.

But when ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, among the Jews, and seditions raised by them in several places against the Romans, see that you be not troubled [and] terrified, as if the great event that I have now foretold would immediately happen; for all these things must first come to pass, and be the gradual openings of it; but the end of them, in the utter destruction of the Jewish state, is not yet: nay, some of you, my disciples will have several important services to perform here after these alarms are begun; services which even by means of these alarms you may pursue with some peculiar advantages.

And then he further added, and said to them, Judea shall not be the only seat of war at that time; for in the neighbouring countries nation shall rise up against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and partly as the consequence of these ravages and slaughters, and partly by the immediate hand of Providence on sinful men who have rejected the gospel, as also to exercise the faith and charity of its professors, there shall be severe famines, and mortal pestilences; and there shall also happen great and terrible earthquakes in various places, and troubles and anguish of mind in the apprehension of yet greater calamities. Here at home there shall also be dreadful sights, and great signs from heaven, particularly a comet like a flaming sword warring over Jerusalem, and the appearance of contending armies in the air. But all these things are

Grotius gives us a particular account of several wars of the Jews among themselves, and of the Romans with the Syrians, Samaritans and other neighbouring nations, before Jerusalem was destroyed.—There were also earthquakes at this time: in Ape- mena, Laodicea and Campania: (see Tacit. Annal. lib. xii. § 45, 58; lib xiv. § 27; lib xv. § 22; Sueton. Nero, cap. 48; Gall. cap. 15.)—The famine in the days of Claudius is mentioned Acts xi. 26, as well as recorded in history, Sueton. Claud. cap. 16, and Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 8); and many perished by it in Judea. See Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2, § 6.

b Dreadful sights, and great signs from heaven, &c.] Of these appearances, see Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 5, (al. vii. 12), § 9, and Tacit. Histor. lib. 5, § 15.—I cannot here but add an excellent observation of Mr. Wetl, relating to the authors by whom this prophecy, which is expressed in terms so very plain and circumstantial, is recorded; that Matthew and Mark were uncontestably dead before the event, as Luke His disciples should first be violently persecuted.

MARK XIII. 9. But take heed to yourselves: for [Luke, before all things] they [Luke, shall lay their hands on you, and persecute you, and shall deliver you up to councils, and to the synagogues, and into prisons,] [to be beaten and afflicted, and shall kill you:] and ye [shall be hated of all nations, and shall be brought before rulers and kings for my [name's sake, for a testimony against them. [Mat. xxiv. 9. Luke xxii. 12.]

LUKE XXI. 13. And it shall turn to you for a testimony.

MARK XIII. 10. And the gospel must first be published among all nations.

11 But when they shall lead you, and deliver you up, [settle it in your hearts, not to meditate before, what ye shall answer; and] take [are] only the beginnings of those sorrows and alarms that will issue in the destruction of Jerusalem.

But take ye heed to yourselves, and be cautious how you behave; and though you meet with the severest persecutions, be not discouraged from persisting in the truth, and from continuing faithful in your regards to me: for before all these things shall happen they shall lay their violent hands upon you, and persecute you with the greatest cruelty and rage; [and] shall deliver some of you up to the greater councils [and] cite others of you to appear before the inferior courts in the synagogues, and shall cast some of you into prisons, to be severely scourged [and] otherwise afflicted by confinement and a variety of hardships there; and indeed they shall go so far as to kill some of you, in a few years: and as for the rest, ye shall be generally hated, not only by the Jews here at home, but by those abroad, and by all the Gentile nations to whom you go; [and] shall be brought before rulers and kings for my name's sake, and for a testimony against them, that the gospel has been offered to them in the most public manner, even to the greatest of men, to whom you might otherwise have had no access: (compare Mat. x. 17, 18, sect. lxxv.) And it shall also turn to you for a public and honourable testimony of the innocence of your cause, however it may be misrepresented, and of the integrity and uprightness of your conduct.

And indeed, notwithstanding this early and violent opposition, yet before the destruction of Jerusalem the gospel must first be preached among all the heathen nations, which are subjected to the Roman empire (see note a); and there also you will be followed with the like assaults and persecutions. But when they shall bring you before governors and kings, and deliver you up to the officers of justice, to be prosecuted as criminals in their most solemn courts, settle it at such times in your hearts as a constant rule not to

Luke also probably might be; and as for John, the only evangelist who survived it, it is remarkable that he says nothing of it, lest any should say the prophecy was foretold after the event happened.—See Wiel on the Resurrection of Christ, p. 393.

1 Shall deliver you up to the council, &c.] All this was exactly accomplished: for Peter and John were called before the sanhedrin (Acts iv. 6, 7): James and Peter before Herod (Acts xii. 2, 3); and Paul before Nero the Emperor, as well as before the Roman Governors, Gallio, Felix, and Festus, (Acts xvii. 12; xxiv. xxi. xvi. xviii.)
The Spirit would help them to make their defence.

to draw up any formal speech, nor to premeditate what answer or apology you shall make; [and] be not anxiously solicitous before-hand what you shall speak in your defence, to vindicate yourselves and your religion from the unrighteous charges and aspersions of your enemies; but whatsoever shall be given in to you, and be strongly suggested to your minds in that hour, that speak boldly and resolutely; for it is not you that speak, but the Holy Spirit himself, who shall assist and dictate to you. (Compare Mat. x. 19, 20, sect. lxxv. and Luke xii. 11, 12, sect. cxi.)

For it is really my cause in which you are engaged; and therefore, though you are ignorant and unlearned men, and so may be apprehensive you shall be confounded in the presence of persons who are in rank and education so much your superiors, yet depend upon it, that I will give you a mouth to plead, and wisdom to answer whatever they alledge against you, which all your adversaries shall not be able to contradict or withstand, but shall be even astonished at the freedom and propriety with which you shall express yourselves, according to the various occasions which arise. (Compare Acts iv. 13, 14.)

And many that have owned themselves my followers shall then be offended, and give up all regard to the gospel, when they see the profession of it must cost them so dear; and having proved apostates, they shall become persecutors too, and shall betray one another, and hate one another, as being in their consciences secretly galled at the greater fidelity of their companions.

And this wretched temper shall rise to such a height, as to break through all the bonds of nature, insomuch that one brother shall betray another, not only to imprisonment, but to death: and the father, on the one hand, shall betray [his] own son; and children, on the other hand, shall rise up as witnesses against [their] aged parents and cause them to be put to death without compassion or remorse. And these scenes, monstrous as they may seem, shall pass in your days, and before your eyes; nay, yourselves shall have a painful share in them: For you, my apostles and servants, shall be betrayed and persecuted even by parents, and brethren, and kindred, and those that pretend to be the most faithful and affectionate friends; and [some] of you shall cause to be slain by the hand of public and and oppressive violence. And indeed this temper shall so generally prevail, that ye shall be hated by almost all ranks and orders, as well as nations of men, for the sake of my name and gospel, though they can find nothing else to object to your character, or accuse in your conduct; and they shall treat you as public enemies, while you are acting the most generous and benevolent part. (Compare Mat. x. 22. sect. lxxv.) But in the midst of all your sufferings be courageous and cheerful, as knowing you are the care of a peculiar and most gracious Providence: so that, on the whole, you shall be safe, and not an hair of your head shall utterly perish, or fall to the ground unregarded. In your patience therefore possess ye your souls, and be calm and serene, the masters of yourselves, and above the agitation of any irrational or disquieting passion. For though your discouragements are great, and k Ye shall be hated by all men for the sake of my name.] That not only the apostles, but all the primitive Christians, were in general more hated and persecuted than any other religious sect of men, is most notorious to all who are at all acquainted with ecclesiastical history. A fact which might seem unaccountable, when we consider how inoffensive and benevolent their temper and conduct was, and how friendly an aspect their tenets had on the security of any government under which they lived. We are not to imagine (as Mons. St. Real weakly insinuates in his ill-digested, though elegant, History of the Life of Jesus, p. 264) that they had any peculiar aversion to the name of Christ. The learned Dr. Warburton has shewn, beyond all contradiction in his masterly manner, that the true reason of this opposition was, that while the different pagan religions, like the confounded demons honoured by them, sociably agreed with each other, the gospel taught Christian; not only like the Jews, to bear their testimony to the falsehood of them all, but also with the most fervent zeal to urge the renunciation of them, as a point of absolute necessity; requiring all men, on the most tremendous penalties, to believe in Christ, and in all things to submit themselves to his authority: see Dr. Warburton’s Divine Legislation of Moses, Vol. I book ii. § 6, p. 278—295. A demand which bore so hard especially on the pride and licentiousness of their princes, and the secular interest of their priests, that it is no wonder they raised so violent a storm against it; which, considering the character and prejudices of the populace, it must be very easy to do.

1 Not an hair of your head shall perish.] Our Lord had foretold but just before (ver. 16), that several of them should be put to death; he must therefore here intend to assure them, that when they came on the whole to balance their accounts, they should find they had not been losers in any the least instance; but that whatever damage they had sustained, it should be amply made up, and they at length placed in a state of entire security. This is plainly the import of this proverbial expression. See 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 2 Sam. xiv. 11. 1 Kings i. 52. and Acts xxvii. 54.

m In your patience possess ye your souls.] Though the word xwpois does often signify to acquire or procure, (see Mat. x. 9. Acts i. 18. viii. 20. xxii. 28), yet I cannot suppose, with Brunnius, that our Lord intends here chiefly to intimate that fortitude and composure of spirit might have a tendency to secure their lives, as it would enable them calmly to deliberate on the several circumstances which might arise. I cannot but think that the sense which the accurate and pious Dr. Wright gives of this passage, in that excellent piece of Christian Philosophy, his discourse on Self Possession (p. 4, 5), is much more natural, as well as more noble; as if our Lord had said, “By keeping the government of your own spirits in these awful scenes, which will beard own so many others, you will secure the most valuable self-enjoyment, as well as be able most prudently to guard against the dangers which will surround you.”

and particularly on this account, that (as I hinted before, ver. 5) many false prophets shall arise and shall deceive many; which some will urge as a farther excuse for suspecting and abusing you: And, though because iniquity shall thus abound under such a variety of forms, the love of many professing Christians, who should be your protectors and comforters, will grow cool; so that they shall be afraid or ashamed to entreat you, and shall be ready to throw up the cause which you so zealously defend: Yet sink not under the burden; but remember this, and let it animate you amidst all your difficulties, that he who resolutely endures all these extremities, and perseveres to the end, shall finally be saved and have his life given him as a prey. (Compare Mat. x. 22.)

And know, for your farther encouragement, that all their rage shall not be able to destroy the interest in which you are embarked, and to which you sacrifice so much; for I assure you, that this glorious gospel of the kingdom of heaven shall first be preached in all the world, for a witness to all its most distant nations: and then shall the end of the Jewish state come, and God, having thus gathered for himself a people from among the Gentiles, shall destroy even this temple itself, in which they have trusted so much, and which they have foolishly looked upon as an inviolable pledge of his favour.

IMPROVEMENT.

The whole of this prophecy most evidently shews us how vain and dangerous it is to trust in external privileges, and to cry out, as these foolish and wretched Jews did, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, are these buildings; when of this stately and magnificent structure, within less than half a and many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many.

12 And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold.

13 But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved. [Mark xiii. 13.]

14 And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come.

This gospel—shall be preached in all the world, &c.] The accomplishment of this extraordinary prophecy is admirably illustrated by Dr. Arthur Young on Idolatry, Vol. II. p. 216—234. It appears, from the most credible records, that the gospel was preached in Idumea, Syria and Mesapotamia, by Jude; in Egypt, Marmorea, Mauritania, and other parts of Africa, by Mark, Simon, and Jude; in Ethiopia, by Candace's nephew, and Matthias; in Pontus, Galatia, and the neighbouring parts of Asia, by Peter; in the territories of the seven Asiatic churches, by John; in Parthia, by Matthew; in Scythia, by Philip and Andrew; in the northern and western parts of Asia, by Bartholomew; in Persia, by Simon and Jude; in Media, Carmania, and several eastern parts, by Thomas; through the vast tract from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum, by Paul, as also in Italy, and probably in Spain, Gaul, and Britain; in most of which places Christian churches were planted in less than thirty years after the death of Christ, which was before the destruction of Jerusalem.
Jesus declares the nearer signs of this destruction.

So particular a prediction, when compared with the event, must surely confirm our faith in Christ, as the great Prophet which was to come into the world. And we shall see reason to admire the wisdom and goodness of Divine Providence in giving us almost by a miraculous preservation of the author, such a commentary on this prophecy as is delivered down to us in the works of Josephus, the Jewish historian, which throw a much stronger light upon it than if they had been written by a Christian on purpose to illustrate it.

Let us bless God that our own eyes have not seen such desolations and ruins, such commotions in the natural and moral world, such dissensions in civil life, such persecutions and hatreds amongst the nearest relatives, under the pretence of propagating religion; which, however propagated, is nothing without that love which is so often made the first victim to it.

Yet too plainly do we see, in one form or another, iniquity abounding and the love of many waxing cold. Let us endeavour to revive on our own hearts a deep and lasting impression of Divine things; and remember, whenever we are tempted to let go our integrity, that it is he alone who endures to the end that shall be saved.

Whatever our trials are, let us cheerfully confide in the protection of Divine Providence; nor let us despair of those continued influences of the blessed Spirit which may animate us to the most difficult services, and support us under the most painful sufferings. Let us therefore in patience possess our own souls, and maintain that composure and steadiness of spirit, as those that know how much more valuable it is than any enjoyment which can be taken away, or any temporal interest which can be brought into question.

SECT. CLXI.

OUR Lord having proceeded thus far in his discourse, added some more immediate signs, by which the near approach of this terrible destruction might be determined; and said, When you shall see Jerusalem encompassed on every every side with the Roman armies, and the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet (Dan. ix. 27), standing where it ought not, and displayed in an holy place; that is, when the standards of their desolating legions, on which they bear the detestable images of their idols, are planted on holy ground; then know, that the desolation thereof is just approaching. And, by the way, now I mention that remarkable prophecy, let every one that reads it pause seriously upon it, that he may understand its meaning; for it contains one of the most eminent predictions which can any where be found, of the time, purposes and consequences of my appearing; and the whole context is of great importance. Now I say, when you see this signal, then let them that are in Judea flee, as fast as they can from the fortified cities and populous towns, to the mountains and the wilderness, where they will be secure; and especially let them that are in the midst of it, where Jerusalem stands, depart immediately out of it, before their retreat is cut off by the union of the enemies' forces near that centre; and let not them that are in the adjacent countries, by any means attempt to enter into it, as a place of safety; for all its strength, and all its sanctity, will not secure its inhabitants. Let every one therefore retreat as fast as possible, and let not him that is taking the air on the battlements at the top of the house, go down into the house, nor enter into it, to take away any thing, though ever so precious, out of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, [Mark, standing where it ought not] in the holy place, (whose readeth, let him understand;) then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. [Mat. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14.]

21 Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it, depart out; and let not them that are in the countries, enter thereinto. [Mat. xxiv. 16. Mark xiii. 14.]

Mark xiii. 15. And let him that is on the house-top, not go down into the house, neither enter therein, for [Planted on holy ground.] Not only the temple, and the mountain on which it stood, but the whole city of Jerusalem, and several furlongs of land round about it, were accounted holy. (See note g, on Mat. iv. Vol. I. p. 113.)—It is remarkable, that by the special providence of God, after the Romans under Cestius Gallus made their first advance towards Jerusalem, they suddenly withdrew again, in a most unexpected and, indeed, impolitic manner; at which Josephus testifies his surprise, since the city might then have been easily taken. By this means they gave as it were a signal to the Christians to retire; which, in regard to this admonition, they did, some to Pella, and others to mount Libanus, and thereby preserved their lives. See Joseph. Boll. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 19 (al. 24), § 7, and Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 5. Of the idolatrous standards in the Roman armies, see Grotius's excellent note on Mat. xxiv. 15.

[b The whole context is of great importance.] If any wonder that so important a prophecy is not more frequently insisted upon in the New Testament, I think we may justly answer, that it was not proper for the apostles to urge it; as the exact commencement and termination of the seventy weeks was a nice controversy out of their way, and not capable of being fully cleared up to the populace, with whom they were chiefly concerned; and as several of the events referred to in it had not their complete accomplishment till some years after most of their writings were published. But that the period is long since elapsed is certain, however it might be reckoned; as Dr. Hulck has excellently shown. See his Vindication, book ii. chap. 4, § 6. p. 216—218, and Dr. Sykes of Christianity, chap. xvi. p. 297-301.
He warns his disciples to flee from the danger.

Mark XIII. 17. But how to them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days. [Mat. xxiv. 19, Luke xxi. 23.—]

18 And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, [neither on the sabbath-day.] [Mat. xxiv. 20.]

c Go back to take his clothes.] These are as strong expressions as one can imagine to urge the speediest retreat. It is indeed observable, that this whole discourse abounds with very lively figures of oratory, and is heightened with the noblest beauties of description. Were it necessary to produce authorities to prove that husbandmen laid aside their upper-garment when at work, they might be found in Elshem (Observe, Vol. I. page 109, 110,) but that learned critic has impaired the beauty of the text by interpreting it as a caution not to go home to fetch them. Not to turn back, implies fleeing directly without going back (as we speak in the country) so much as a land's length to take them up; and so it rises on the former verse.

d May then be said to be completely fulfilled.] Among many admirable things to be found in that great original, Dr. Jackson's Credibility of the Scriptures, I cannot but reckon that part of it, in which he shows how exactly the prophecies of Moses were accomplished in the slaughter and dispersion of the Jews in, and quickly after, this fatal war with the Romans. See the passages quoted below, in note m, p. 243.
Great tribulation would be in those days.

And a case of extremity it will indeed be: for in those days there shall be a scene of great tribulation and distress in the land of Judea, and of dreadful wrath from heaven upon all this people, such as the like has not been known before, either here or elsewhere, even from the beginning of the creation which God has made unto this time; nor ever shall the like be heard of any more: as no people ever have been, or ever shall be, guilty of so aggravated a crime, and so inexcusable a series of impenitence and infidelity. And therefore they shall fall by the edge of the sword in multitudes, both within and without the city; and the consequence of all shall be, that the miserable remnant which survives the general canrage shall be carried away captive into all the most distant nations of the world, and continue for many ages under great infamy, calamity, and oppression. And in the mean time, Jerusalem itself shall be trampled down and kept in possession by the Gentiles, till the times appointed for these triumphs and insults of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled, and the day come when God shall remember his ancient people in mercy.

And

e Such as the like has not been,—nor ever shall be.] This Josephus expressly asserts to have been the fact; and whoever reads his account, or even that judicious abstract from him which Eusebius has given us, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 5, 6.) will see a sad illustration of all this; and, criminal and detestable as the Jewish nation was, will hardly be able to forbear weeping over those complicated miseries brought upon them by plagues and famine, and fires, occasioned by the siege, and by the carnage made, not only by the Romans, but by the yet greater cruelties of the seditious and zealous within the city, who really acted the part of so many incarnate fiends rather than of men.

f They shall fall by the edge of the sword and shall be carried captive, &c.] It appears from Josephus that eleven hundred thousand Jews were destroyed in this war, and near an hundred thousand taken prisoners, and (according to Deut. xxviii. 68.) sold for slaves at the vilest prices. See Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 9. (al. vii. 17.) § 3.

g Jerusalem shall be trampled down by the Gentiles.] Their land was sold, and no Jew was allowed to inhabit there (a rigour never used, that I know of; towards any other people conquered by the Romans; nay, they might not come within sight of Jerusalem, or rather of Elia, the name given to the new city, which was built without the circuit of the former when the foundations of the old were ploughed up. A heathen temple was afterwards built where that of God had stood; and a Turkish mosque pollutes it to this day; so remarkably was the hand of God upon them. And it is well known, by the testimony of a heathen writer, (who ridiculously ascribes it to the fatal resistance in the element,) that Julian's impious attempt to rebuild their temple, and settle them in Jerusalem again, in professed contempt of this prophecy, was several times miraculously defeated by the eruption of balls of fire, which consumed the workmen. See Ammian. Marcell. lib. xxiii. cap. 1 p. 286.

h Till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.] It is much easier to vindicate the authority of the words μετα των ολιγων αποθεμένων from the objection of Dr. Mill [Proleg. p. 133.] chiefly founded on their being omitted in the Cambridge Manuscript, than to determine the signification of them. I cannot suppose, with Mess. Le Clerc and L'Enfant, that by the accomplishment of the times of the Gentiles, we are to understand the time when Constantine put an end to the Gentile idolatry in Jerusalem, and
And during the wars which are to bring on the said catastrophe, except the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh could be saved; the whole nation would be utterly exterminated from the earth, and the name of Israel no longer be had in remembrance: but for the elect's sake, whom he has graciously chosen to be at length partners of the blessings of his gospel, God will so order it in his providence, that those days shall be shortened; for he hath still purposes of love toward the seed of Abraham, which shall at length take place, (Rom. xi. 26) and, in the mean time, he will make their continuing a distinct people a means of confirming the faith of Christians in succeeding ages.

As these then are the counsels of the Divine Wisdom concerning this people, do not expect, that when calamities begin to threaten them, any miraculous deliverer should be raised up for them; and if any one shall then say unto you, Behold the Messiah here or behold [he is] there, do not believe [it] or shew the least regard to any such report. (Compare Luke xvii. 23, p. 62.)

For and established the christian worship there. Ezek. vii. Const. lib. iii. cap. 25. It seems reasonable to suppose that here, as in other places, the Gentiles are opposed to the Jews; and consequently, that all the period between the destruction of Jerusalem and the restoration of the Jews to their own land, so expressly foretold in scripture, is here intended. (See Isa. xxvii. 12, 13. Ezek. xi. 17. xx. 40, 42. xxxiv. 13. xxxvi. 24. 28. xxxvii. 21—28. xxxix. 28, 29. Hos. iii. 5. Amos ix. 14, 15. and Zech. xiv. 10, 11.) With this indeed is connected the bringing in, what St. Paul calls, the fulness of the Gentiles: Rom. xi. 25, 26. But unless it could be proved (which I do not recollect) that the inhabitants of Palestine shall then peaceably surrender it to the returning Jews, it seems most natural to suppose the time of the Gentiles here signifies the time when they shall be visited and punished; which is the sense in which this very phrase, and others nearly parallel to it, frequently occur in the Old Testament; as Brennius justly observes. (Compare Ezek. xxx. 3 (as also Jer. xxvii. 7. 1. 27. Ezek. xxi. 25, 29. xxii. 3, 4.) And, if this be the sense of it, it seems an intimation that the Turks, or some other antichristian power, may continue possessed of the holy land till the restoration of the Jews; for one can hardly suppose their way into it should then be opened by the conquest of a Christian nation.

I Except the Lord had shortened these days, no flesh could be saved, &c.] Such were the quarrels that prevailed among the Jews, that numbers of them were destroyed by one another: and the whole country was become a scene of such desolation and bloodshed, that not only those who were shut up in Jerusalem, but the whole Jewish nation, would have suffered much more by the longer continuance of the siege, considering how much the same spirit prevailed among them in other places.—Mr. Reading in his Life of Christ, p. 309. understands the days being shortened for the elect's sake, of the preservation of the Christians at Pella, whose safety he supposes to have depended on the shortening of the siege, and whom he takes to be the elect intended here. (See Dr. Whitby on Mark xiii. 20.—Of the special providence by which the siege was shortened, see Grotius on Mat. xxiv. 22.

Their continuing a distinct people, a means of confirming the faith of Christians, &c.] This I have shewn at large in my ten Sermons, Sermon tenth; and the reader may see the remark farther illustrated by Mr. Addison, Special. Vol. VII. No. 495, and in Bishop Burnet's Four Discourses, p. 8—10.

Falce
For as this unhappy people, who are now so obstinately rejecting me, will to the last support themselves with vain hopes of that kind, and be ready eagerly to hearken to every bold impostor false Messiah and false prophets shall arise, and shall pretend to show great signs and prodigies, managed with so much art, as might, if [it were] possible, be sufficient to deceive even the very elect, and to pervert my sincere followers and disciples themselves; though indeed their hearts shall be so established by Divine grace as finally to be secured from the danger. But be ye cautiously upon your guard against so dangerous an imposition; for behold I have expressly foretold you all these things; that on comparing the event with the prediction, your faith may be established by those very circumstances which in another view might have a tendency to shake it. Therefore if they shall say unto you, Behold, we have found the expected Messiah, and he is now gathering his forces about him in the wilderness for the deliverance of his people, do not go forth to join yourselves to his followers; [or] if they shall say, Behold [he is] in the secret apartments of some particular friend, where he is waiting to give satisfaction to those that desire it, do not believe [it] nor give yourselves the trouble so much as to inquire into the affair. For you know there is, and can be, no other Messiah but me; and when I appear it will be in a sudden, amazing, and irresistible manner; and as the lightning breaks forth from the east, and shines in a moment even to the west part of the horizon, subsisting with superior miraculous powers. But it can never be inferred from such a supposition in that case, that God will suffer miracles to be wrought in proof of falsehood, when there are none of his servants to perform greater miracles on the side of truth. And when such superior miracles on the side of truth do exist, the opposite miracles at most can only prove that some invisible beings of great power, who are the creators of falsehood, are strongly engaged to support the contrary doctrine; the consideration of which must excite all wise and good men to receive a truth so opposed with greater readiness, and to endeavour to promote it with great zeal; as they may be sure the excellence and importance of it is proportionable to the solicitude of these malignant spirits to prevent its progress.
so sudden and conspicuous also shall the coming of the Son of man be, both in his appearance to the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the final judgment. (Compare Luke xvi. 24, p. 62.) And very extensive also will the desolation be; for, as I formerly told you, (Luke xvi. 37, p. 64.) wherever the dead carcasse is, there will the eagles naturally be gathered together; and wherever the obstinate enemies of my kingdom are, they shall be sought out and destroyed: and here in particular I will send the Roman eagles against them, who shall consume and devour them as a helpless prey, not only at Jerusalem, but over the face of the whole country; and afterwards in some more distant regions, where the greatest numbers of Jews are settled m.

IMPROVEMENT.

If our Lord urges his disciples, with such speedy and solicitous haste, to flee from the sword of God's temporal judgments, how much greater diligence should we give to flee from the wrath to come! What are any of the little interests of life, that out of regard to them we should be willing to continue one moment longer exposed to a danger which may sink us into everlasting perdition and despair!

We have here a lively description of that aggravated ruin which was brought upon the Jews for neglecting Christ; even great tribulation, such as had never, from the very beginning of the world, fallen upon any other nation, nor shall ever be equalled. Thus was his blood upon them, and their children. (Mat. xxvii. 25.) May we never know what it is to have this blood crying against us for trampling it under foot as an unholy thing! (Heb. x. 29.) For surely to the Jews, who thus rejected the counsel of God against themselves, all these things which they suffered were but the beginning of sorrows; and the famine and sedition, pestilence and slaughter, by which so many thousands perished, served only to consign

m In some more distant regions, &c.] There may perhaps be an oblique intimation in this passage of the slaughter afterwards made on the Jews elsewhere, and particularly under Adrian and Trajan; when what had been foretold by Moses (Deut. xxviii. 49, & seq.) was remarkably fulfilled, and as an eagle flies upon its prey, their enemies pursuied them to destruction; and the calamities they underwent were such, that (as Dio Cassius informs us, Hist. lib. 69) 50,000 were slain, 500 of their fortresses were demolished, and 900 of their chief towns in Egypt, Crete, &c. were plundered and burnt to the ground: not to mention the terrible things they afterwards suffered in France, Italy, Spain, and other parts of Europe, in the decline of the Roman empire; of all which see Dr. Jackson's Eternal Truth of the Scriptures, book i. part 2, sect. 3, chap. 6, 10—13.
Jesus describes the tribulation of those days.

consign them over to infinitely more terrible indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, which will at last fall on every soul of man that doth evil, whether Jew or Gentile. (Rom. ii. 8, 9.)

These unhappy creatures eagerly listened to the very name of a Messiah, by whomsoever it was assumed; while they rejected him whom God had sent them, and who had so long, and with so much importance, been renewing to them the offers of life and salvation. May none of us ever know the sad impatience with which condemned sinners will wish, and wish in vain, for those overtures and messages of grace which they now despise! In that sense, wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together: wherever there is the like unbelief and impenitence, there will be in its degree the like ruin. Christ has graciously told us these things before: may we humbly attend to the warning, that none of this terror and destruction may ever come upon us!

SECT. CLXII.

Christ describes the total destruction of the Jewish state by strong figures, many of them literally suitting the day of judgment: to the mention of which he proceeds, declaring the particular time of it unknown. Mat. XXIV. 29—36. Mark XIII. 24—32. Luke XXI. 25—33.

LUKE XXI. 25.

Our Lord proceeded in the awful representation of the judgments that were coming on Jerusalem, and said, Before this desolation shall be completely come, there shall be (as I told you, ver. 11.) some extraordinary signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; eclipses, comets, and surprising meteors; and on the earth there shall be anguish and distress of nations; the sea and the proud waves thereof roaring, and breaking in upon the land with an irresistible inundation; While men shall be almost expiring with fear, and overwhelmed with the sad expectation of those calamitous things which are coming upon the land: for this shall not be like former invasions or captivities, which only produced some transient disorders in the state, or at most some of the latest of those mentioned in the writers referred to above in notes \( \text{a} \) and \( \text{b} \) on ver. 10, 11, p. 252.

LUKE XXI. 25.

And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea, and the waves roaring;
most, an interruption in the government for a few years; but it shall be attended with such a total subversion of it, and with such vast, extensive, and lasting ruin, that it shall be a most lively emblem of the desolation of the whole world at the last day.

For immediately after the affliction of those days which I have now been describing, the sun shall as it were be darkened, and the moon shall not seem to give her usual light; and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens, all the mighty machines and strong movements above, shall be shaken and broken in pieces; that is, according to the sublimity of that prophetic language to which you have been accustomed, the whole civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the nation shall not only be shocked, but totally dissolved. And then shall there evidently appear such a remarkable hand of providence in avenging my quarrel upon this sinful people, that it shall be like the sign of the Son of man in heaven at the last day; and all the tribes of the land shall then mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming as it were in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory; for that celestial army which shall appear in the air marshalled round the city, shall be a sure token to them may be a remote, though not an immediate reference.

b Immediately after the affliction of those days.] Archbishop Tillotson, and Brennus, with many other learned interpreters, imagine that our Lord here makes the transition from the destruction of Jerusalem, which had been the subject of his discourse thus far, to the general judgment: but I think, as it would, on the one hand, be very harsh to suppose all the sufferings of the Jewish nation, in all ages, to be called the tribulation of those days; so it would, on the other hand, be equally so to say that the general judgment, which probably will not commence till at least a thousand years after their restoration, will happen immediately after their sufferings; nor can I find any one instance in which this is used in such a strange latitude.—What is said below (in Matt. xxiv. 34; Mark xiii. 30; and Luke xxi. 32; p. 247) seems also an unanswerable objection against such an interpretation. I am obliged therefore to explain this section as in the paraphrase; though I acknowledge many of the figures used may with more literal propriety be applied to the last day, to which there He delivers the parable of the fig-tree.

...them that the angels of God, and the great Lord of those heavenly hosts, are set as it were in array against them. And, to pursue the allusion, as at the great day the angels shall in a literal sense assemble all his saints together, so also he shall then send forth his messengers* with the great sound of his gospel, as of a loud trumpet, and they shall assemble his elect from the four winds, even from one end of the heavens to the other, or from the uttermost part of the earth one way to those climates which lie under the uttermost part of heaven the other way; and multitudes of all nations shall obey the summons, though the Jews have ungratefully and foolishly despised it; and the Son of man shall be honoured and trusted by millions now unborn, when this wicked and perverse nation is perished in their rebellion and infidelity. And when these things begin to come to pass, be not you terrified and dismayed, but rather cheerfully look upwards; and lift up your heads with joy and assurance; for whatever happens, you will be secure; and as soon as you see the first appearance of these signs, you may comfortably conclude that your complete redemption and deliverance draws nigh; for many of you will be safely brought home to the haven of eternal peace before these storms are ended, and the rest of you will not long survive them.

29 And, further to illustrate what he had been saying, he spake to them a very easy and familiar parable, saying, Behold now, [and] learn a parable.*

* Send forth his messengers.] Most translations, as well as our own, greatly obscure this text, by rendering the word angels; for though it generally signify those celestial spirits who are on great occasions the messengers of God to our world, it is well known that the word refers not to their nature but to their office; and is often applied to men, and rendered messengers. See Mark i. 2; Luke vii. 24, 47; ix. 52; 2 Cor. vii. 23; Phil. ii. 25; and Jam. ii. 25. In some of which places it signifies, as here, preachers of the gospel, who were sent forth to carry on God's great design of uniting all his chosen people in one society under Christ, as their common head. Eph. i. 10.

[Look upwards: ans..] This is an expression which admirably suits the load of labour and sufferings under which the apostles would be depressed in this afflicted state. See Raphel. Annot. ex Herod. p. 270.

[Your redemption draws nigh.] As the resurrection is the time when we shall in fact be fully redeemed, or delivered from all the sad consequences of sin, and therefore is called the redemption of our bodies, (Rom. viii. 23; compare Eph. iv. 30, and Hos. xiii. 14): so in a less proper sense the deliverance from all the toils and sorrows, temptations and infirmities, of this sinful and calamitous life, may, on the like principles, be called redemption. And if we may judge of the length of the apostles' lives by the extent of their labours, though we know not the time when many of them died, there is reason to conjecture it was not till after this period; which, by the way, would be an argument they were now most of them young men.

31 And [then] he shall send his angels, with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other, from the uttermost part of the earth, to the uttermost part of heaven. [Mark xiii. 27.]
The generation shall not pass till all were fulfilled.

32 Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled. — [Mark xiii. 34. Mark xiii. 30.]

33 Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away. — [Mark xxiv. 33, Mark xiii. 31.]

Mark XIII. 32. But of that day, and that hour, ble from the example of the fig-tree and all the other trees that drop their leaves in the winter: When buds appear upon the fig-tree, and its branch is now become tender, and the sap rising in the other trees, they shoot forth their young leaves, and begin to open and spread, you see and know of your ownselvess; by the observation you have often made, that summer is now near at hand, as these are certain prognostications of it: So likewise you, when you shall see all these things come to pass, may assuredly know that the destruction of the Jewish state, and the advancement of the kingdom of God in all its glory, is just at hand, [even] at the doors; or that the time is coming when the desolation I have been speaking of shall come upon Jerusalem, and the gospel shall be propagated all abroad, and take such root in the world, that you may assure yourselves it shall never be destroyed.

And verily I say unto you, and urge you to observe it, as absolutely necessary in order to understand what I have been saying, That this generation of men now living shall not pass away until all these things be fulfilled; for I have foretold concerning the destruction of the Jewish state is so near at hand, that some of you shall live to see it all accomplished with a dreadful exactness: And the rest may die in the assurance of it: for another and yet more awful day shall come when, in a literal sense, heaven and earth shall pass away, and the whole fabric of this visible world shall be dissolved before my majestic presence; but my words shall not pass away till they are perfectly fulfilled, and the efficacy of them shall remain in the eternal world which shall succeed these transitory scenes.

But though Jerusalem shall be destroyed before the generation disappear, yet of that great decisive day which is appointed for the dissolution and the judgment of the world, and of the hour.

h This generation shall not pass away until all these things be fulfilled.] Though Brunius, and Mede (in his Works, p. 759), have here the honour to be followed by so great an authority as Dr. Sykes (of Christianity, p. 60), yet I must beg leave to say that I cannot think the texts they collect sufficient to prove that by this generation [κατα μνήματα] we are here to understand the Jewish nation through all ages; as if our Lord intended to say they should continue a distinct people to the judgment day. — What I have expressed in the paraphras is plainly the most obvious sense of the words, and seems to me an evident key to the whole context, especially when compared with Mat. xvi. 28. There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom. See note i, on that text, Vol. I. p 465.
Reflections on the day of Christ’s coming to judgment.

hour or season when it shall open upon men, and shall bring upon their final sentence, there is no one who knows the precise time, neither the angels in heaven, nor even the Son of man himself, with respect to his human nature, or as a part of what he is commissioned to reveal; for though it be determined by the Divine decree, it is not known to any but my Father alone, or the indwelling Godhead, from whom nothing can be concealed: and, as he does not think fit to disclose it, let it be your care to improve this uncertainty as an engagement to the most diligent and constant preparation for its coming.

IMPROVEMENT.

Let us now raise our contemplations to that awful day when all that was figuratively spoken of the destruction of Jerusalem shall be literally accomplished; and let us consider our own intimate concern in it. Where will our hope and comfort, our light, and our safety be, when the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, when the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken? Where, indeed, unless the almighty God, the everlasting Jehovah, by whose voice they were created, and by whose hand they shall be dashed in pieces again, shall descend to be our light, and our salvation? (Psal. xxvii. 1.) And if he indeed be so, then we may lift up our heads with joy; as knowing that our complete redemption draweth nigh, even that long expected day, which with all its solemn horrors, has still been the brightest object of our faith and our hopes.

There is not any thing in this assertion of our Lord, if we consider the two natures in him, that is inconsistent with his true divinity. For what is applicable only to one nature is frequently expressed in terms inclusive of his whole person. Thus, as the endowments of his human nature were communicated in a gradual manner to him, Jesus is said to have increased in wisdom (Luke ii. 52.) and even while he was on earth, as he was present everywhere with respect to his Divine nature, he speaks of himself as the Son of man who is in heaven. (John iii. 13.) Nor is it at all more strange that he should here be said not to know the day appointed for the final judgment, than that it should be elsewhere said that the Lord of glory was crucified (1 Cor. ii. 5), and that God purchased the church with his own blood. (Acts xx. 28.)
Then shall the Son of man indeed come in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, and send his angels to summon his elect, and to assemble them from one end of heaven to the other; for the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God. (1 Thess. iv. 16.) May we hear the summons with joy, and stand in our lot among his chosen ones! What though the day and season be unknown? It is enough for us that we know that all these interposing days and years, be they ever so numerous, will at length be past; for the promise of the great Redeemer is our security, and he will hasten it in its time. (Isa. lx. 22.)

These visible heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and the earth shall be removed out of its place; but the sure word of his promise shall never pass away; even that promise which is engaged for the salvation of his people. Let us often review it; let us firmly realize it to our souls, and, seeing we look for such things, let us seriously consider what manner of persons we ought to be in holy conversation and godliness. (2 Pet. iii. 11, 14.)

SECT. CLXIII.

Our Lord urges the suddenness of his appearance as an engagement to constant watchfulness, repeating several things which he had formerly said on that subject. Mat. XXIV. 37, to the end. Mark XIII. 33. to the end. Luke XXI. 34—36.

BUT as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be,

38 For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, world; and went on thus, in contempt of every serious admonition, even until the very day that Noah entered into the ark; and knew not, nor suspected, that any evil was approaching, till the deluge came with an irresistible violence, and bore them all away with a torrent of destruction; so also shall the coming of the Son of man be; and notwithstanding men have been so frequently and plainly warned of it, yet, multitudes shall be surprised in an unprepared state. (Compare Luke xvi. 26, 27. p. 52.)

40 I formerly told you with relation to the temporal desolation of your country, and I now repeat it, That of two men who shall then be at work together in the field, the one shall be seized, and the other dismissed; And of two women who shall be grinding corn at the same mill, the one shall be seized, and the other dismissed: (compare Luke xvii. 35, 36. p. 64.) And I may say the like with respect to that important event of the final judgment; many who have been engaged in the same stations and employments, and who were intimately conversant with each other, shall then be found exceedingly different in their characters and states; and some of them shall be made the prisoners of Divine justice; while others shall not only be spared, but be signally favoured by God.

* They were eating and drinking, &c.]

Dr. Woodward (in his Theory of the Earth, p. 98) thinks these were modest expressions to signify their giving themselves up to all the extravagancies of riot and lust; and Hofius (in loc.) has most learnedly proved that γαῦρασα is often used in a very criminal sense. But how great reason there may be to believe that the Antediluvian sinners did so, these words may be intended to express no more than the security and gaiety with which they pursued the usual employments and amusements of life when they were on the very brink of utter destruction.

b Two men shall then be in the field, &c.]

Though in the paraphrase, for its better connection, I have introduced these words incidentally, and hinted how they may accurately be accommodated to the day of judgment, yet I doubt not they originally refer to the destruction of Jericho, to which alone they are properly applicable. After this paragraph there is not a word peculiar to it; but many circumstances are introduced which refer to the day of judgment (and of death, as transmitting to it), and which can only be thus understood. I therefore humbly conceive that the grand transition, about which commentators are so much divided, and so generally mistaken, is made precisely after these two verses.—

Our Lord, in the following verses of Matthew and Mark, directs their thoughts to that final solemnity in which they are so highly concerned, by repeating almost in the same words the cautions and advice he had formerly given, Luke xii. 35, &c. sect. exv. in which whole context (as I there observed, note, Vol. 1. p. 582) there is no reference to those temporal calamities that were coming on the Jews, which have been here the subject of almost the whole preceding discourse. And the remembrance of what had passed on the former occasion might more easily lead them into the distinct understanding of what was now added. Though it may not be improper to recollect that the same pious care in their temper and conduct, which would be a preparative against national judgments, and cut them to the special protection of providence in them, would also secure them from any unwelcome surprise by a call to the tribunal of God.

And therefore, that no calamities of life, or solemnities of judgment, may be dreadful to you, take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overloaded, and your rational powers depressed and stupefied by gluttony and drunkenness, or distracted with worldly and secular cares, and by this means that awful and important day, of which I have been speaking, should come unexpectedly upon you. For the character of the generality of mankind at that time will be such, that it shall come on the greatest part of all them, that dwell on the face of the whole earth as a snare upon a thoughtless bird which in the midst of its security, finds itself inextricably taken. (Comp. Eccles. ix. 12.) Let me therefore address this most serious exhortation to you, and an earnestness proportionable to its importance, Watch ye against every temptation to negligence and sin, take heed of every thing which might pull you into a dangerous security, and might always, with the most fervent importunity, that through Divine grace you may be accounted worthy to escape all these calamitous and destructive things which shall assuredly come to pass just in the manner I have described them, and may be happily enabled, even in the day of his universal judgment, to stand forth with courage and acceptance before the Son of man, for you know not when the time of his appearance is, [or] at what hour.

e Your hearts be overloaded.] The word properly signifies burdened, or pressed down; and so very elegantly and strongly expresses the hateful consequence of intemperance, and the bond which it brings on those rational faculties which are the glory of the human nature. The reader will observe that Luke's account of this discourse is very short, in comparison with that of Matthew and Mark, for this obvious reason, that he had given the chief heads of it before, partly in a discourse of our Lord's last coming, which was delivered to a very numerous assembly in Galilee, (Luke xxi. 35—44, sect. cxvii.) and partly in another discourse, relating only to the destruction of Jerusalem, which was delivered in his journey thither at the feast of dedication: (Luke xvii. 29-57, sect. cxxxviii.) Here therefore he chooses to omit what had been inserted on either of those occasions; as, John, who probably wrote after the accomplishment of this prophecy, entirely omits it, as already so largely recorded by the former three; from whom, considering the circumstance of time, it came with infinitely better grace than it could afterwards have been known to stand before the Son of man at his coming. I do not apprehend that this is merely the counterpart of escaping the things spoken of before. There were thousands of the Jews that by one providence or another escaped temporal destruction, who could with no propriety be said to stand before the Son of man, at his coming. I have therefore paraphrased this latter clause as an advance upon the former, which gives this context a greater connection, and juster distinction, than the order in which most harmonists place these verses.
hour your Lord does come to summon you before him.

But this you know, and would do well to consider it, that if the master of a house that has at any time been plundered by robbers had known exactly in what watch of the night the thief would have come, he would undoubtedly have watched then; and taking care to be provided for him, would not have suffered his house to be broke open or have left the thief to make his advance by coming at an unexpected time. And therefore, as it is of so much greater consequence on this occasion that you should be prepared against an unseasonable surprise, be ye also ready and learn from such a common occurrence to be upon your guard; for I tell you again, That at an hour when you think not of it, the Son of man cometh; and multitudes of people will be as much surprised as if they had never heard in their whole lives that he would come at all.

[For the Son of man is] in this respect as a man travelling to a distant country, who, as he was leaving his house, gave authority to his head-servants, to direct and oversee the rest in their business, and assigned to every man in the family his proper work, and particularly commanded the porter to watch, and to see to it that the doors were properly secured, and ready to be opened to him at his return.

And who now, do you my apostles suppose, is the faithful and prudent servant, of whom his Lord has so good an opinion as to have appointed him ruler over the rest of his household, to give them [their] proper portion of food in due season? You must easily apprehend that the expression may with the utmost propriety be applied to that high office with which you are invested, and to the confidence placed in your integrity and wisdom. And, to excite you to discharge this office with the greatest fidelity, let me add, Happy indeed is that servant whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find thus employed in the proper duties of his important office, distributing to each his portion in a proper manner.

Verily I say unto you, as I formerly

f Happy is that servant whom his Lord when he cometh, &c.] As no peculiar rewards were conferred on any of the apostles, or other faithful ministers, at the time of Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem, this clause sufficiently proves a reference to the final judgment; and will not permit us with Dr. Hammond, to understand the

Mat. XXIV. 43.—But know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up.

44 Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as you think not, the Son of man cometh.

Mark XIII. 34.—For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch.

Mat. XXIV. 45.—Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat, in due season?

46 Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing.

47 Verily I say unto you, that he which receiveth a believing soul to operate upon, must,
But the wicked shall have his portion with hypocrites.

48 But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming;

49 And shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken:

50 The lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of;

51 And shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

But, on the other hand, the faithless wretch 48 that is dishonest in the execution of so high a charge shall be severely punished: and 49 if that wicked servant shall presume to say in his heart, My Lord delays his coming: And shall on that 49 presumption begin to beat and abuse those of his fellow-servants, who are more faithful than himself, and to eat and drink in a riotous and extravagant manner with the debauched and drunken part of them, or with other dissolute persons; he will do it at his peril: For the lord of that servant shall certainly come in a day when he does not expect [him] and in an hour when he is not at all aware, and cannot have time to put on a face of better order, or to provide and invent artful excuses; And, seeing him in the midst of his revels and usurpations, he shall scourge him so severely, that he shall even cut him asunder, and appoint [him] his portion with hypocrites, the most odious kind of sinners in the sight of God: with these shall this false creature be righteous doomed to dwell for ever in those doleful regions where there shall be nothing but weeping and gnashing of teeth, proportionable to his former indulgence and luxury, and to the importance of that trust which he so wickedly betrayed.

Let me then caution you, O my apostles and ministers, severly scourged, after which idle slaves were often thrown into a prison, where they lived miserably in every respect. To this our Lord alludes with a most obvious propriety. See sect. cxiv. note 1.

b His portion with hypocrites. Mahomet in his Alcoran mentions Seven Caverns in hell, the deepest and most wretched of which is to be inhabited by hypocrites, (Sur. iv. v. 144.) Elsner, who takes this for a Jewish notion, by a very singular criticism supposes it, or something analogous to it, referred to here and Rev. xxii. 8. where he thinks byrre are the same with hypocrites; and observes very precariously, that taking the fearful and unbelieving, or those that through cowardice apostatize, for the first sort of criminals, liars are the seventh class.
ministers, never to suffer this important exhortation, which I have now being given you, to be forgotten in any circumstance of life; but watch ye therefore continually, for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, whether in the evening-watch, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning: Early and late hold yourselves in a prepared posture, lest coming suddenly, he find you sleeping, and negligent of your proper duty. And what I say to you in public characters, I say to all my disciples, in every station of life, and in every age, Watch; for in every age and station you will have need to do it, and security may be attended with the most fatal consequences.

Improvement.

Luke xxi. 36. Mat. xxiv. 42
Mark xiii. 34. Luke xvi. 34. 35.

What slothful hearts must we have if these repeated admonitions do not awaken us; even line upon line, and precept upon precept? The patience of God is waiting upon us, as it did on the old world, while the ark was preparing: (1 Pet. iii. 20.) May we take the warning, and seek shelter before the door be shut against us! Let us therefore take heed, lest sensuality and secular cares overcharge and depress our hearts, and amuse us with vain delusions, till sudden and unavoidable destruction come upon us. (1 Thess. v. 3.)

We are by profession the domestics of Christ. Let us attend to the offices he has assigned us, though he seem at a distance. Let us diligently wait his coming, at whatever season. Let his ministers especially wait it; and be solicitous, that they may be found so doing, conducting themselves like wise stewards of the mysteries of God, dispensing to every one his portion of food in due season. Then will our account be honourable, and our reward glorious.

May God deliver us from the guilt and condemnation of the cruel, and imperious, and the luxurious servant, who began to beat his fellows, and to eat and drink with the drunken; since we are expressly told his dreadful doom! Justly does our Lord declare that to such a one he will appoint a portion with hypocrites, terrible as their portion must be; for no hypocrisy can be baser than to call ourselves the servants and ministers of Christ, while we are the slaves of ambition, avarice, and intemperance. Wherever such are found, under whatever mask and form, may he reform them by his grace, or disarm them of that power and influence which they continually abuse to his dishonour, and to their own aggravated damnation! Let us 'in the mean time time be exhorting each other daily, while it is called to-day, lest any by insensible degrees be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, (Heb. iii. 13;) and let us always remember that every exhortation which we give to others returns with redoubled weight upon ourselves.

SECT. CLXIV.

Christ enforces his exhortation to watchfulness by the parable of the ten virgins. Mat. XXV. 1—13.

Mat. XXV. 1. Our Lord, in order to impress upon the minds of his hearers a concern about the great and awful day of future judgment, to which the latter part of his preceding discourse had so plainly referred, went on to represent it under a variety of most lively figures, and particularly by the following parable; saying, Then or in that day of final account, when the faithful servant shall be rewarded, and the treacherous hypocrite so severely punished, shall the kingdom of heaven, or the state of things under the gospel dispensation, appear to be like the case of ten virgins, who, being invited to a marriage-feast (which, according to the custom of this country, was to be celebrated in the night), took their lamps as soon as it begun to grow dark, and went out together to meet the bridegroom, and to light him to the house where the banquet was to be kept.

And it appeared by their conduct that five of them were prudent persons, and five of them were foolish and inconsiderate, who made no provision against an accident which might very naturally happen. They that were foolish, when they took their lamps, went forth with them lighted, but did not take any oil with them beside that

Ten virgins.] This whole parable contains a plain reference to the custom which prevailed among the Jews then, and still prevails among many eastern nations: (see The Customs of the Jews and Indians compared, p. 41, 8° ed.) The bridegroom used to conduct his bride home in the evening by the light of lamps, which were used (as Elster shews, Observ. Vol. I. p. 114, 115) by the Jews and Romans on the like occasion: they were carried by bride-maids, who used afterwards to sup with them; and some tell us their number must at least be ten.—It seems, from the circumstances of this parable, that if any of the neighbours, besides those who were directly invited, thought it worth their while to pay their respect to the new-married couple, it was esteemed a decent piece of civility to admit them to a share in the bridal-feast, if they made their appearance at a proper time.
The wise, who were ready, go in with the bridegroom.

But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps.

While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept.

And at midnight there was a cry made; Behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him.

Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps.

And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us some of your oil, for you seem to have a great stock with you; whereas our lamps are gone out, and all our oil is spent. But the prudent replied [We cannot do it], lest there should not be enough for us and you, and so we should all be left on a sudden without light and the bridegroom be disappointed and affronted, but rather go ye to them that sell oil in the neighbourhood, and buy some for yourselves, as soon as possible, that ye may follow and join in the procession.

And while they went to buy it at that inconvenient time of night, the bridegroom and his retinue came; and those maids that were ready to receive him joined the company; and when they came to the bridal-house, they went in with him to the marriage-feast; and, to prevent disturbance, the door was shut and fastened.

And some time after the other virgins also came, and knocking at the door, called with great importunity.

b In the middle of the night. Perhaps the tradition, which Jerom mentions, that asserted Christ would come to judgment at midnight, might be borrowed from hence; though to be sure it is a very absurd one, since that can be the case only under one meridian at a time. A celebrated commentator has clouded this parable exceedingly, by attempting to explain it of the different effects Christ's admonition concerning the destruction of Jerusalem would have on different persons.

c Buy for yourselves. This seems merely an ornamental circumstance; and it is strange that any Popish writers should consider it as favouring their doctrine of a stock of merits in the church, founded on works of supererogation; since, if it referred to them at all (which there is no reason to imagine), it would rather expose than encourage any dependance upon them.

importunity, saying, Sir, Sir, we desire you would open to us, who are also some of your guests, though by an unfortunate accident we are come a little too late. But he, being unwilling to be disturbed in the feast, and to open the door again, answered them, saying, Truly, I say unto you, I know you not whence you are: my house is already furnished with guests, and I will admit no more. Thus these thoughtless creatures entirely lost both their labour and expense, meeting with nothing but disappointment and shame. And such will be your case if you content yourselves with a mere empty profession of religion, while you sink into a careless and negligent conduct, and remain destitute of that principle of real piety which ought to give lustre and vigour to it.

15 Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh.

Let us apply our hearts to the obvious instructions which this well known parable so naturally suggests. We are under a religious profession: our lamps are in our hands; and we go forth as those that expect to meet Christ; as those that desire and hope to be admitted to the marriage-supper of the Lamb. But, alas, how few are there that are truly prepared for such a blessedness! Would to God there were reason to hope that the Christian church were so equally divided, that five of ten in it had the oil of Divine grace in their hearts, to render them burning and shining lights!

Let even such as have it be upon their guard; for our Lord intimates that the wise as well as the foolish virgins are too apt to slumber and sleep, and carelessly to intermit that watch which they ought constantly to maintain. There may be, at an unexpected time,
The parable of the talents.

time, a midnight cry. Happy the souls that can hear it with pleasure; being not only habitually but actually ready to obey the summons! Happy they that have their loins girded, and their lamps burning! (Luke xii. 35.)

8, 9 The foolish virgins saw their error too late; they applied to the wise: but their application was vain. And as vain will the hope of those be who trust to the intercession of departed saints, or any supposed redundancy of merit in them; while they are themselves

10—12 strangers to a holy temper and life: In vain will they cry, Lord, Lord, open to us. The door of mercy will be shut for ever, and the workers of iniquity utterly disowned. The day of grace has its limits; and for those that have trifled it away there remaineth nothing but the blackness of darkness for ever! (Jude, ver. 13.)

SECT. CLXV.

Christ repeats the parable of the talents in a form something different from that in which he had before delivered it. Mat. XXV. 14—30.

Mat. XXV. 14.

Jesus, having delivered the preceding parable of the virgins, went on farther to illustrate the subject, by the repetition of a parable resembling one which he had used some time before (Luke xix. 12—27, sect. cxiv.) and said, Let me again remind you of the great importance of preparing for my coming by a diligent improvement of your gifts; for the time when [the Son of man] shall come, and the grand administration of judgment attending it [will be] as the proceedings of a man [who], going a long journey, called his servants together, and

15 delivered his effects to them: And to one of them he gave five talents, and to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his respective capacity to manage the sum, and to the prospect

[To one he gave five talents.] According to Dr. Prideaux's calculation, if these were talents of gold, the value of the five must have been 56,000 pounds sterling, and if silver, 2250 pounds. (See the Preface to his Connection, p. 20.) And perhaps this great sum was chosen to intimate the value and importance of those capacities and opportunities committed to every reasonable creature, and especially to every professing Christian. But I do not lay any very great stress on this remark, because it is plain, that as Homer uses the word καλέσας for a sum, or perhaps a small wadge of gold, of considerably less value than the price of two fat oxen (Iliad 4. ver. 730, 731.) so the signification of it among much later writers is very indeterminate.

Well
to his several ability: and straightway took his journey.

16 Then he that had received the five talents, went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents.

17 And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two.

18 But he that had received one, went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money.

19 After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them.

20 And so he that had received five talents came, and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou wast pleased so far to intrust me, that thou didst deliver to me five talents, when setting out on thy journey; and such is the improvement I have made of them, that behold, I have doubled the sum, and gained to them five talents more. And his master said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord.

22 He also that had received two talents came, and said, Lord thou deliveredst unto me prospect there might reasonably be of his improving it: and immediately he went away, and set forward on his journey.

And he who had received the five talents, went and engaged in business, and traded with them so diligent a manner during the absence of his master, that he doubled the sum, and produced five talents more. And in like manner he who had received the two, was so industrious in employing them to the best advantage, that he also gained two more. But he who had received but one talent, being displeased that he had been intrusted with no more, was seized with sullen indolence and servile fear, and went away directly, and attempted no improvement of it, but privately digged [a hole] in the earth, and hid his master's money in it, till he should return home.

Thus the matter passed off for a while; but after some considerable time the master of those servants cometh, and makes up his accounts with them, demanding from each the sum with which he had been intrusted, and inquiring what was the interest he had gained by it.

And he who had received the five talents came near, and brought other five talents with them, saying, Sir, thou wast pleased so far to intrust me, that thou didst deliver to me five talents, when setting out on thy journey; and such is the improvement I have made of them, that behold, I have doubled the sum, and gained to them five talents more. And his master said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful in the management of a few things: and, having proved thee to be so in this lower trust, I will prefer thee to a higher, and set thee over many more valuable things than these: in the mean time, enter thou into the joy of thy master, and share with me in the banquet prepared for myself and my friends on this happy occasion of my return.

He also who had received the two talents came forwards, and said, Sir, thou wast so indulgent, that thou didst deliver to me at thy going hence two

Well done, thou good and faithful servant.] The original word ὁδὸς has a peculiar force and energy, far beyond what I can exactly express in English. It was used by auditors or spectators in any public exercise, to express the highest applause when any part had been excellently performed. Bravely done! comes something near it, but is not equally elegant or forcible.
two talents, which I have endeavoured to employ as carefully as I could; and behold, by trafficking with them I have gained two other talents to them. And his master said unto him, as he had done to the former, Well done, thou good and faithful servant, thy care and diligence is as agreeable to me as if thy trust had been greater; thou hast been evidently faithful in a few things; and I will in like manner prefer thee to a higher trust, and set thee over many more valuable things than these: in the mean time, come to the entertainment now prepared, and enter thou with thy companion into the joy of thy master.

But he also who had received the one talent, came and said, with a sullen and gloomy countenance, Sir, I knew thee, that thou art a severe man, and that it is a very difficult thing to please thee, since thou art so exact with thy servants, as even to think of reaping where thou didst not sow, and of gathering whence thou hadst not scattered any thing that could be taken up; requiring more in many instances than is possible for them to do, be they ever so careful: And being terrified with this thought, I concluded that, if by any accident thy money should miscarry under my management, thou wouldst shew me no mercy; and therefore I went away, as soon as I had received it, and hid thy talent in the earth, in a place where it has been very secure; so that I have now taken it up, and behold [there] thou hast thine own again, and wilt find it to be the full sum I received.

And his master answering, said unto him with a just indignation, Thou wicked and slothful servant, what a false and scandalous excuse is this, and how easily may it be retorted upon thee! For if it were indeed, as thou maliciously sayest, and thou knewest that I was such a tyrannical and unreasonable man as thou hast described, even that I reap where I did not sow, and expect to gather something up from whence I had not scattered it, thou mightest certainly depend upon it that I should expect to reap where I had sowed, and 6 He who had received the one talent.] This may intimate that we are accountable for the smallest advantages with which we are intrusted; but it cannot imply that they who have received much will ordinarily have their account best; for it is too plain in fact, that most of those whose dignity, wealth, and genius, give them the greatest opportunities of service, seem to forget they have either any master in heaven to serve, or any future reckoning to expect; and many of them render themselves much more criminal than this wicked and slothful servant who hid his talent in the earth.

27 Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the ex-changers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury.

28 Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents.

29 For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he hath.

30 And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

and to gather where I had scattered that which, in this instance, as well as the others, might have been an increasing seed. And therefore, if thou hast been afraid to employ it in trade, as these my faithful servants have done, thou shouldst have put my money to the bankers upon sufficient security! and thus when I came I might at least have received mine own with the common interest. And then, turning to the attendants, he said, Take ye therefore the talent which he has thus abused from him, and give it to him that has ten talents, as a farther token of my acceptance and favour. For I would have all my servants observe that I shall constantly make this a maxim in my behaviour, That to every one that hath, and diligently improves what he hath, more shall be given; and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not improved it to any valuable purpose, even what he hath shall be taken away: (compare Mat. xiii. 12. Mark iv. 25. Luke viii. 18. xix. 26.) Such unfaithful creatures must expect to be stripped of all, and not imagine that I will perpetually suffer my trusts to be abused, and my business to be neglected. And, to deter others from such an idle an unfaithful conduct, cast ye the unprofitable servant, who has so wickedly abused my goodness, into the dreadful darkness which is without: and there, instead of the delight and joy to which my faithful servants shall be introduced, there shall be nothing but weeping and gnashing of the teeth. Now this horrible darkness, to which my parable refers, is no other than the dungeon of hell; to which every unfaithful servant must expect to be condemned in that approaching day of general account: fail not therefore to observe and report what I now say, that it may give the alarm to all who need it.

IMPROVEMENT.

What can excite us to a becoming care and activity in the duties of life, if we are deaf to those various and important motives which this excellent parable suggests? We have each of us received our talents, whether five, or two, or one; and if we be faithful, it matters not much under which of these classes we fall. Our acceptance and reward will be proportionable to our diligence; nor will any be blamed because he has not received five, though many will be condemned for neglecting one.
Yet a little while, and our Lord comes to reckon with us, and even now his eye is continually upon us. Let us ask our own souls, with what temper, with what courage, with what cheerful-ness, shall we appear before him? Let us think of that appearance with awe, but not with terror. Away with every unjust thought and reasoning (with whatever artifice it be excused, with whatever honourable name it be dignified) that would represent him as a rigorous and severe Master, and produce a servile dread, which would cut the sinews of industry, and sink the soul into a sullen negligent despair.

Whatever our particular snares in life may be, let us think of the doom of the slothful servant, to awaken our souls, and to deter us from every degree of unfaithfulness. And, on the other hand, let us often reflect on that unutterable transport which will overflow the breast of every real Christian, when his gracious Master shall condescend, in so honourable a manner, to commemorate his honest, though feeble, attempts of service; and shall say, Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord! May that joy be the great object of our hopes and pursuits! and may our daily care in the improvement of every talent lodged in our hands be a token to us that it will be sure and great!

Christ concludes this important discourse with a plain and affecting description of the last judgment, and of the different sentences then to be passed and executed on the righteous and the wicked. Mat. XXV. 31, to the end.

Mat. XXV. 31.

When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the disciples to conceive of his first coming to the destruction of Jerusalem as a kind of emblem of his final appearance to judgment; and consequently it will authorise us to use some of the texts in the former chapter when discoursing of that great and important day.—I hope every reader will observe
When he shall separate the righteous from the wicked.

the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory.

52 And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats:

33 And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left,

34 Then shall the King say unto them,
on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom

in the most public honours of his mediatorial kingdom, to which all things shall then be completely subjected, (1 Cor. xv. 25, 28;) and all the holy angels, who have long been subjected to him as his ministering servants, shall come with him; then shall he sit upon his glorious and majestic throne, conspicuous in the eyes of the whole world, as the universal Judge. And all 32 the nations of men, who have lived on earth from the remotest ages of time, shall be assembled before him: and he shall separate them from each other, according to their different characters, which he most perfectly knows, with as much ease as a shepherd separates the sheep, which belong to his flock from the goats which may be mingled with them, and places them in distinct companies. And he shall set 33 the sheep, that is, the righteous, whom he will own as such, and whose characters resemble the innocence, meekness, and usefulness of that animal, on his right-hand, in token of his favour to them, and of the farther honours he will bestow upon them: but the goats, that is, the wicked, who are so offensive to him, that they may justly be represented by goats, he shall place on [his] left, to intimate his displeasure against them, and their final removal from amongst his people; nor shall the haughtiest and mightiest sinner be able to resist that appointment by which he is placed in this situation to avoid his sentence. (Compare Ezek.
xxxiv. 17, 18.)

Then, when by the ministry of the angelic 34 attendants they are thus separated from each other, the great King of glory and of grace, who presides over this grand solemnity, shall,
with the most condescending endearment, say to serve with what majesty and grandeur our Lord speaks of himself in this section, which is one of the noblest instances of the ture sublime that I have any where read; and indeed few passages, even in the sacred writings themselves, seem to equal it. Methinks we can hardly read it without imagining ourselves before the awful tribunal it describes.

b All the nations shall be assembled before him.] Had the notion which prevailed among some later Jews, that the Gentiles should have no part in the resurrection, been as old as our Lord's time, it is easy to see these words might have been understood as a direct intended opposition to it.

c Nor shall the haughtiest sinner, &c.] I can imagine no more magnificent image than this; the assembled world distinguished with such unerring penetration, and distributed into two grand classes, with as much ease as sheep and goats are ranged by a shepherd in different companies.—The propriety with which our Lord speaks of himself in the following words, by the title of a King, is very observable; and it adds unutter-able beauty to the condescending words he is represented as speaking on this great occasion.

He will reward the righteous for their kindness to him.

1 I was sick, and ye looked after me.] This seems the exactest sense of ἐσώθηκα, which in general signifies to take the oversight and cure of any thing that requires diligent inspection and attendance (compare 1 Sam. i. 27. and Ephe. Observ. Vol. I. p. 117.) and it strongly intimates that such an attendance on the poor in their illness is a very acceptable charity; and this is what many may have an opportunity of doing who have very little money to spare.
But the wicked shall be punished for neglecting him.

41 Then shall he say unto them on the left-hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels:

42 For I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink.

43 I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not.

44 Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee?

Ye did it to me, &c.] That alms-deeds should be remembered with peculiar regard in the day of judgment was a notion that early prevailed among the Jews, as appears by the Chaldee Paraphrase on Eccles. ix. 7, which bears a remarkable resemblance to these words of Christ, and might perhaps be an imitation of them. See Mede's Works, p. 81.

7 Prepared for the devil and his angels.] There is a remarkable difference between our Lord's expression here and in ver. 34. There the kingdom is said to have been prepared for the righteous from the foundation of the world; whereas here the everlasting fire is not said to have been prepared for the wicked, but for the devil and his angels.—Compare Rom. ix. 23, 29.

3 Then shall they also answer, &c.] Perhaps it may only intimate this shall be the language of their hearts, which Christ perceiving, will reply to it. I see no necessity for supposing they shall actually plead thus. Multitudes will no doubt remember they have often heard what reply will be made to such a plea: God grant that none who read it here may be in the number of those to whom it will be made!

And...
And then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, and declare it in the most solemn manner, That inasmuch as ye did [it] not to one of the least of these once necessitous, though now triumphant saints, who dwelt among you on earth, and needed your assistance, ye did [it] not to me; and I justly thought myself neglected and injured when you shut up the bowels of your compassion towards them.

And so, to conclude all, these miserable wretches, notwithstanding all the excuses they can urge, shall go away into a most dreadful state of everlasting punishment; but the righteous, through the abundant grace of God manifested by his Son, shall enter into everlasting life: and thus the great scene shall close in the eternal happiness or misery of every human creature who has ever lived on the face of the earth.

IMPROVEMENT.

Let us now behold, with an attentive eye and a solicitous heart, the end of all the living; that awful scene, in which the various dispensations of God to mankind shall terminate in the solemn day, when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and sit on his magnificent throne. All nations and people shall be assembled before him, and we must make up a part of the assembly. The sheep and the goats must then be separated: and, O my soul, amongst which wilt thou then be numbered? Is there an inquiry, is there a care, of greater, of equal, of comparable importance?

Let us view the sentence we must shortly hear, as he who will himself pronounce it, has been pleased to give us a copy of it.

Can we conceive any thing more dreadful than that which shall be passed on those on the left hand? To be driven from the presence of Christ as accursed, and to be consigned over to a devouring fire! and this is not only to the tortures of a moment, or an hour (as in some painful executions that have been known here,) but to everlasting fire, yea, to fire prepared for the devil and his angels, where they will be perpetual companions, and perpetual tormentors! should not the thought that he is in danger, in hourly danger, of being sealed up under this sentence, awaken the most stupid sinner, and engage him eagerly to cry out, What shall I do

As the original word eternal is the same in both places, I thought it proper to use the same word in the translation of both; and miserable are they that dare venture their souls on its signifying a limited duration in either.
Reflections on the sentence he will pass on the wicked. 267 do to be saved?—And on whom is this sentence passed? Let us attentively observe it! Not merely on the most gross and abandoned sinners, but on those who have lived in an habitual neglect of their duty: not merely on those who have ravaged and persecuted the saints (though surely their furnace will be heated seven times hotter than that of others), but even on those who have neglected to relieve them.

On the other hand, let us seriously reflect what it will be to be owned by Christ before the assembled world; and to hear him saying with a sweet smile, and with a voice of harmony and love, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. How infinite is the love that prepared that kingdom for us before we had a being! how rich the blood that purchased it! how overflowing the grace that bestowed it on such mean, such undeserving creatures! Bless the Lord, O our souls, in the prospect of it! Let men curse, O Lord, if thou wilt thus bless; (Psal. cix. 28. Let them load our names with infamy if thou wilt adorn them with such glory: let all the kingdoms of the earth, and all the pomp of them, be despised and trampled under foot, when offered as an equivalent for this infinitely more glorious kingdom.

Let us attentively observe the character of those who are to receive it. They are the useful and benevolent souls: such as have loved the Lord Jesus Christ, not only in his name, and ordinances, and promises, but have loved him in his laws, and in his people too; and have known him in those humble forms in which he has been pleased, as it were by proxy, to appear among us. I was hungry, and ye fed me; thirsty, and ye gave me drink, &c.; for in as much as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me. Amazing words! that the meanest saint should be owned by the King of glory as one of his brethren: Irresistible argument to those that do indeed believe these words, to stir them up to abound in every good word and work! Under this impression, methinks, instead of hiding ourselves from those who should be to us as our own flesh by virtue of our common union to him, we should not only hearken to their intreaties, but even search them out in those corners to which modest want may sometimes retire, and cast about in our thoughts how we may secure any happy opportunity of relieving some poor saint for their sakes, and for their Master's, and even for own. What if Christ came to us in person as a poor helpless stranger? What if we saw him destitute of food and raiment, or in want of any other necessaries of life? Should we not contend for it as an honour, which of us should receive him into our houses, which of us should entertain him at our table, which of us should even strip ourselves of
The passover was now within two days.

But we know not Christ in this disguise. Neither did these unhappy creatures on the left-hand know him: they are surprised to be told of such a thing; and yet are represented as perishing for it. Away therefore with all those religious hopes (vainly so called) which leave the heart hardened, and the hand contracted from good works! If we shut up the bowels of compassion from our brethren, how dwelleth the love of God in us? (1 John iii. 17.) Or to what doth the love of Christ constrain us, if it be not to the exercise of gratitude to him, and the offices of cheerful and active friendship to those whom he now owns as his brethren, and whom he will not be ashamed to call so in the midst of his highest triumph? Blessed Jesus, how munificent art thou! and what a fund of charity didst thou lay up in the very words which are now before us! In all ages since they were spoken, how many hungry hast thou fed, how many naked hast thou clothed, how many calamitous creatures hast thou relieved by them! may they be written deep in our hearts, that the joy with which we shall finally meet thee may be increased by the happy effect of this day's meditation!

SECT. CLXVII.

The Jewish rulers consult how they might take Christ, and Judas agrees with them to deliver him privately into their hands. Mat. XXVI. 1—5, 14—16. Mark XIV. 1, 2, 10, 11. Luke XXI. 37, to the end. XXII. 1—6.

Thus our Lord ended his discourses on this subject on the third day of the week in which he suffered; and thus he was generally employed from the time of his public entry into Jerusalem to his last passover: he was teaching by day in the temple, and at night he went out of the city, and lodged at the mount called [the mount] of Olives, in the neighbourhood of which Bethany lay; in the retirement of which particularly in the garden of Gethsemane, he often spent a considerable part of the night; being desirous to secure that only season of solitude, that he might prepare himself for his approaching suf-
And the Jewish rulers consult how they might take Christ.

Luke xxii. 1. Now the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the passover, [and was after two days. [Mark xiv. 1.]

Mat. xxvi. 1. And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these sayings, he said unto his disciples, 2 Ye know that after two days is the feast of the passover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified.

Then assembled together the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of the people, unto the palace of the high-priest, who was called Caiaphas; [Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 2.]

And consulted how they might take Jesus by subtlety, [and put him to death. [Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 2.]

But they said, Not on the feast-day, lest there be an uproar among the people: [Luke 2.]

And all the people came early in the morning to him in the temple, for to hear him.

Luke xxii. 2. And it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished all these discourses, and the appointed hour for his sufferings was now at hand, he said to his disciples, Ye know that after two days the passover cometh; and in the plainest terms I now assure you the Son of man is then to be betrayed to his inveterate enemies, that, according to what I have often told you (Mat. xvi. 21, and xx. 18, 19), he may be put into the hands of sinful men to be crucified: prepare yourselves therefore for that trying season, that you may not be hurried into any thing which you may afterwards have reason to repent.

Then that very evening the chief priests of every class, and others employed in distinguished services in the temple, together with the scribes, and the other elders of the people, who were members of the grand sanhedrim, assembled together not indeed in the temple, where they usually met, but at the palace of the high-priest, who was then called Caiaphas; (as was observed before, John xi. 40, p. 127.) And there they entered into a secret conspiracy, and consulted how they might privately take Jesus by some artifice, without giving an alarm to his friends, and might put him to death as soon as possible, which one way or other they were determined to do. But they had such an apprehension of his interest in the people, that some of them were rather for delaying it, and said, It will be more advisable to wait till after the passover, and not

Two days after.] I apprehend that the preceding discourses (from sect. eli.) were delivered on the Tuesday of the week in which he suffered; and he probably uttered the following words that evening, which was just two days before the paschal lamb was eaten.—I do not find that any of the transactions of the Wednesday are recorded besides the general account given above. One not to attempt to seize him at the feast, while there is such a concourse in the city from all parts; lest the design that we have formed against him should be discovered, and, considering how popular he is, there should be a tumult raised among the people, either to rescue him from our hands, or to revenge his death. Such were the cautious sentiments of some among them; for they feared the people: but others pushed the matter on with greater forwardness and zeal, and were by no means for deferring it; to which at length the rest agreed, upon finding a more favourable opportunity than they expected, offering itself through the treachery of Judas.

For then, just at that very juncture of time, Satan, by Divine permission, entered into Judas, who was also called Iscariot, and was (as we observed before) one of the number of the twelve apostles who were chosen by our Lord from the rest of his disciples to the most honourable trust as well as the most endearing intimacy; and as this malignant spirit had before suggested to him the horrid design of betraying his Master, he now strongly impressed his mind that during his retirement he might easily find a convenient time for executing it, and might be sure of being well rewarded for it by the rulers of the Jews. And, under this impression, he immediately went away from Christ and his company to the house of Caiaphas, whom he knew to be a most inveterate enemy to his Master; and having found means of introducing himself, and communicating his general design, he conversed with the chief priests and captains of the temple, who were not yet gone away, and deliberated how he might with the greatest convenience and security betray him unto them. And as the sordid wretch proposed it with a covetous view, before he would come to any agreement with them, he said, without the least appearance of shame or remorse, What are you willing to give me, and I will undertake to deliver him to you at a time and place in which you may effectually secure him without the danger of giving any alarm to the people?

And

Luke xxii. 13. Then entered Satan into Judas, surnamed Iscariot, being [one] of the number of the twelve: [Mark xxvi. 14.—Mark xiv. 10.—]

4 And he went his way and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them: [Mark xxvi. 14, Mark xiv. 10.]

And said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you?

And the evangelists hath marked it out in this view. Compare with these places John vii. 71, Vol. I. p. 457.

And when they heard his proposal, they thought [it] very practicable: and they were glad of so unexpected an offer from one of his own disciples to facilitate their measures; and therefore readily promised in general to give him a sum of money as a reward for that service; and at last they expressly agreed with him for thirty pieces of silver, which was the price to be paid for a slave who had been slain (see Exod. xxvi. 32;) and as they proposed it to express their contempt of Jesus, so God permitted Judas, covetous as he was, to acquiesce in that mean and trifling sum (though he might easily have raised it higher,) that thus the prophecy might be fulfilled in which it had been particularly specified, (See Zech. xi. 12, 13.)

And he promised to take a punctual care in the affair: and accordingly from that time he diligently sought a proper opportunity to betray him unto them, that they might come upon him privately, and apprehend him in the absence of the multitude: nor was it long before this happened, as we shall quickly relate in its place.

IMPROVEMENT.

We see with what unremitting vigour the great Author and Finisher of our faith pressed forward towards the mark, and how he quickened his pace, as he saw the day approaching; spending in devotion the greatest part of the night, which succeeded to his most laborious days, and resuming his work early in the morning! How much happier were his disciples in these early lectures than the slumbers of the morning could have made them on their beds! Let us not scruple to deny ourselves the indulgence of unnecessary sleep, that we may come morning after morning to place ourselves at his feet, and lose no opportunity of receiving the instructions of his word, and seeking those of his Spirit.

But while his gracious heart was thus intent on doing good, the chief priests and rulers of the people were no less intent on mischief and murder. They took counsel together how they might put him to death: They set upon his head the price of a slave, and find an apostle base enough to accept it. Blush, O ye heavens, to have been

3 Thirty pieces of silver. A slave was rated by the law at thirty shekels of silver, which, if we reckon them at half a crown (which is supposed to have been about their real value), amounted to no more than three pounds fifteen shillings of our money; a goodly price that he was prized at of them. been witness to this; and be ashamed, O earth, to have supported so infamous a creature! Yet this was the man who but a few days before was the foremost to appear as an advocate for the poor, and to censure the pious zeal of Mary, which our Lord vindicated and applauded (John xii. 4—8. p. 151, 152.) Let the fatal fruits of his covetous disposition, instigated by Satan, be marked with abhorrence and terror; and if we see this base principle harboured in the breasts of those who call themselves the disciples and ministers of Christ, let us not wonder if by God's righteous judgment they are given up to those excesses of it which bring upon them lasting infamy and endless predation.

SECT. CLXVIII.

Christ, having directed his disciples where to prepare the passover for him, comes to Jerusalem for the last time before his death, and sits down with them to the celebration of it. Mat. XXVI. 17—20. Mark XIV. 12—17. Luke XXII. 7—18. John XIII. 1.

LUKE XXII. 7.

NOW after this infamous bargain which Judas made with the chief priests to betray into their hands his innocent and Divine Master, on the fifth day of the week, before the evening when the first day of unleavened bread came, in which, according to the precept of the law, which had expressly limited the time of it, the passover must be killed, or the pascal lamb be slain, in commemoration of the Israelites being preserved from the destroying angel, and delivered out of Egypt, Jesus determined to keep the passover with his disciples. And, that he might in a due manner celebrate it with them, he sent two of his disciples, Peter and John, from the place where he had spent the night before in retirement with them, and said, Go to Jerusalem, and prepare the passover for us, that we may once more eat [it] together.

3 And he sent [two of his disciples], Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the passover, that we may eat. [Mark xiv. 13.]

* The first day of unleavened bread came.

There is no room to question that the time when Christ sent his disciples to prepare the passover was on the Thursday of the week in which he suffered; and though the first day of unleavened bread, most strictly so called, was the fifteenth day of Nisan, and began with the evening that the passover was eaten, yet it is not improbable that the evangelist might sometimes speak according to the usual way of reckoning days among other nations; and so, as the use of leaven among them was to cease by sun-set at farthest, and they were obliged to eat their supper, which was the chief meal, with unleavened cakes, it might naturally enough be called by this name.
And they said unto him, Where wilt thou that we [Mark, go and] prepare [for thee to eat the passover?] [Mat. xxvi. 17. Mark xiv. 12.]

10 And he said unto them, [Go into the city to such a man, and] behold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water; follow him into the house where he entereth in. [Mat. xxvi. 18.—Mark xiv.—13.]

11 And [Mark, where-soever he shall go in ye shall say unto the good man of the house: The Master saith unto thee, [My time is at hand, I will keep the passover at thy house,] where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples? Mat. xxvi. 18. Mark xiv. 14.]

12 And he shall shew you a large upper room furnished [and prepared:] there make ready [for us]. [Mark xiv. 13.]

A man will meet you, &c.] As Samuel, having anointed Saul, for the confirmation of his faith gave him several predictions relating to some very contingent occurrences he was to meet with in his journey (see 1 Sam. x. 2—7, so our Lord seems by these predictions to have intended the same with regard to his disciples, and also to give them a most important hint that he foresaw all the particular circumstances which were to befall him at Jerusalem when he went up thither for the next and last time before his sufferings.—The sending them to Jerusalem in this manner seems to intimate, that he did not go thither himself that morning so that it is very probable he spent most of the day in retirement for meditation and prayer.

My time is near.] Every body knew that the time for eating the passover was near; for that these words must be supposed to have a further view. And I am therefore ready to believe that the owner of this house, to whom our Lord sent this message by the name of the teacher, might be a person who (though unknown to Peter and John) was in his heart at least a disciple of Christ; and our Lord might give this intimation, that it was to be a time of more than ordinary importance to him, that it might be some secret support to this man’s faith under that violent shock it was soon to receive by his approaching sufferings.

We shall be able to find the house, &c.] The same prophetic gift which ena-
And after he had given these particular instructions to his two disciples, they went out from thence, and came into the city, and found the man carrying the water, whom they followed into a house, where there was, just as he had said to them, a commodious dining-room at liberty, and well furnished: and as the master of the house was free to let them have it, they did as Jesus had appointed them, and made the passover ready against the time when he should come to eat it.

And in the evening, when the proper hour for eating the passover was come, he came directly to the house where his messengers were, and sat down to the table with all the twelve apostles around him, to taste (according to the usage of those days) the unleavened bread, and the bitter herbs, before the lamb was served up.

Now it is here to be observed, that before he began to eat the feast of the passover, as Jesus knew that his hour was come when he should depart from this calamitous world, in which he had sojourned for a while, to return to the bosom of the Father in which he originally dwelt, he was solicitous to order every circumstance of his conduct in this last intercourse with his disciples, so as might most effectually promote their edification and comfort, and make it clearly manifest that having always tenderly loved his own that were in the world, he loved them in the most perfect degree.

bled Christ to predict these circumstances would, doubt, guide him thither; and it is a beautiful modesty in the sacred historian only to hint obliquely at it; but I apprehend it the part of a paraphrast to set these particulars in a fuller and stronger light.

e To taste the unleavened bread, &c. I must here entreat my reader, if he has an opportunity, to consult Ainsworth’s excellent Note on Exod. xii. 8, where he has collected from authentic Jewish writers the best account I have any where seen in so little room of the various ceremonies with which the passover was enlivened, by which the subsequent story is greatly illustrated. Among others, the following circumstances should be recollected:—That the master of the family began the feast with a cup of wine, which, having solemnly blessed, that is, having adored the name of God over it, he divided among the guests (Luke xxii. 17), and afterwards washed his hands:—Then the supper began with the unleavened bread and bitter herbs, which, when the master and the rest of the company had tasted, one of the younger persons present, generally a child, asked the reason of what was peculiar in that feast (according to Exod. xii. 26), which introduced the haggadah, that is, the showing forth, or declaration of it; (in allusion to which we read of showing forth the Lord’s death, 1 Cor. xi. 26.)—Then the master rose up and took another cup, and washed his hands again before the lamb was tasted: and in this interval, I suppose, Christ also washed the feet of his disciples:—Then, after eating the passover, followed another cup, which, after having delivered to each a piece of bread, was the sacramental cup at this supper:—Then, after some pious and friendly discourse, the whole family, after having drank at least a fourth cup, sang some psalms of praise: and so the solemnity ended. Agreeable to this is the account given in the Religious Ceremonies of all Nations. Vol. I. p. 215—217.
Taking the cup before the passover, he divides it among them.

Luke XXII. 15. And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer.

16 For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.

17 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves, 18 For I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come.

We may well assure ourselves, that the same Divine penetration and prophetic discernment which enabled the blessed Jesus thus circumstantially to foretell to his disciples those most contingent occurrences which were to determine the place where they should prepare the passover, would also open to him a prospect of all that was to follow. All the scenes that were to be passed through on this fatal night, and the succeeding black and bloody day, were, no doubt, attentively viewed: the agony of the garden, the traitorous kiss of Judas, the cowardly flight of all the other apostles, the insults of his seemly victorious and successful enemies, the clamorous accusations, the insolent buffettings, the scourges, the thorns, the nails, the cross and all that he was to endure upon it from the hand of God and men. Yet behold, with all these in his view, he goes on with a holy alacrity, and this sun of righteousness, rejoiceth as a champion to run his race! (Psal. xix. 5.) Yea, when he is sitting down to the paschal supper (though therein was exhibited, in a most lively emblem, the bitterness of his own sufferings,) he utters these gracious and emphatical words, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer.

John xiii. 1. So justly might it be said of him, as we see it is, that having loved his own, which were in the world, he loved them to the end. O blessed Jesus, may the ardour, the courage, and the permanency of our love to thee, bear at least some little proportion to that wherewith thou hast condescended to love us! May we long, from time to time, to celebrate with thee that Christian passover which thou hast ordained to succeed the Jewish, as the memorial of thy sacrifice! Yea, may we long for the last solemnity of this kind, which will ere long come, after which we shall no more drink with thee of the fruit of the vine, till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God! In the mean time may we be cheered with thy love, which is indeed far better than wine, (Cant. i. 3.) and, thus supported with those reviving cordials which thy gospel administers, may we keep ourselves in the love of God, and in the patient expectation of thy final, most glorious, and welcome appearance! (2 Thess. iii. 5. and Jude, ver. 21.)

Christ rebukes the ambition which his disciples most unreasonably expressed as they were sitting down to supper, by washing their feet, and adding several excellent admonitions to the exercise of humility, immediately before the eating of the paschal lamb, Luke xxii. 24—27. John XIII. 2—17.

John XIII. 2.

Now when our Lord had thus sat down to eat the passover with his disciples (as was said before,) supper being come, a and the antepast or introduction to it having been dispatched, as above: Just in the interval between that and the serving up the paschal lamb, there was a most unreasonable contention among them b, as a Supper being come.] The reasons brought by Bishop Kidder (in his Demonstration of the Messiah, part iii. chap. 3, p. 60, 61,) by Dr. Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. on Mat. xxvi. 6,) and since by Dr. Wightby (in his notes on this place,) to prove that this supper was not the passover, but another supper at Bethany a night or two before, I have briefly obviated in the paraphrase or notes on the places on which they are grounded; and therefore cannot think it material to trouble the reader with a particular detail of them. The chief reasons which determine me to the contrary opinion (besides some others, of which a good summary is given in Dr. Gugy's valuable Note on this place,) are these: such a disposition of the story best suits several of the circumstances of the paschal supper, (particularly the contention about superiority, and the inquiry about Judas, both which must, on the other hypothesis, have been superseded;) and the propriety of it is especially evinced from John xiii. 38, where our Lord says to Peter, The cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me three; which must be spoken the very night Jesus was betrayed, and yet is so connected with this story of washing the disciples' feet by ver. 21, and ver. 31, that they cannot without great violence be separated; and it is certain, John xiii. 1, will have a peculiar energy according to this plan; which therefore most critics have followed.—The reader will observe here that I have rendered ἦτοι γεφυρά τοῦ πασχαλινοῦ συππερ ἐσχάτη, which is the sense in which the word is often used elsewhere: thus John xxi. 4. πάσχαλον γεφυρά; is when morning was come; Acts xiii. 15. xvii. 33. πάσχαλον γεφυρά when day was come; and Acts xxii. 50. σπαθὶ γεφυρά; when silence was made; in all which places, and in many more that might easily be collected from the Greek writers, it would be absurd to translate the word ended. Nay, Luke iv. 42. γεφυρά, ὑπάρχει, signifies when the day was coming on. (Compare Mark i. 35. note f.) It is indeed an ambiguous term; but the rendering above is here to be preferred, (1.) Because it was much more natural to wash the feet of guests before than after supper. (2.) Because it is expressly said, in ver. 1, to have been done before the passover, which, if the preceding reason be admitted, determines the point. (3.) Because part of the discourse, which John mentions as happening after the feet were washed, is mentioned by the other evangelists as passing at supper: nay, John himself, when he speaks, in ver. 26, of Christ's dipping the sop, and giving it to Judas after this, plainly shows that supper was not ended.—As the latter part of this 21 verse comes in by way of parenthesis, I have transposed that clause, and inserted it afterwards in ver. 21, to introduce what relates to Judas in the next section; a freedom which will, I hope, be easily excused.

b There was a contention among them.] If the reasoning above be allowed, we must certainly transpose Luke's account of this contention about superiority; for none can imagine it should follow immediately after Christ had been giving them so affecting a lesson of humility. But Luke seems less exact in the order of this story than the other evangelists; and particularly relates what passed concerning the person as they sat at table with Jesus, which of them should be accounted the greatest in that kingdom of which he had been speaking, and which they interpreted of a temporal dominion that should succeed his approaching sufferings. (Compare Mark ix. 34, and Luke ix. 46, Vol. I. p. 486.)

__John XIII. 3.__

[And] upon this, though Jesus knew that the Father, by the sure engagements of an immutable covenant, had given the government of all things into his hands, and was just going actually to invest him with all power both in heaven and upon earth; and that as he came forth from God as his Messenger to men, so he was returning to God again; yet, conscious as he was of so great a dignity, he was nevertheless willing to give his disciples an example of the deepest humility in this his last interview with them before his passion: With this design, and in order to shame them out of that ambitious contention which he observed among them, in a more forcible manner than any words alone could do, he riseth from supper; and whereas it was only usual for the head of the family at such a time to wash his own hands, he lays aside his upper-garments, and taking a towel, tied it round him like a kind of an apron; And then pouring water into a large cistern, or sort of cistern commonly used on these occasions, he began himself to wash the feet of [his] disciples and to wipe [them,] after they were thus washed with the long ends of the linen cloth with which he was girded, which hung down to his feet.

person that was to betray him after the Eucharist, though both Matthew and Mark place it before.

__He riseth from supper._ As it is here asserted, that Christ rose from supper, we must allow, that, in some sense, supper was begun, that is, as I suppose, the antepast had been taken, which is mentioned by the Jews as preceding the Paschal Lamb: (See Ainsworth's note quoted above, note c, p. 274.) They tell us, that it was then usual for the master of the family to wash his hands: and if I am rightly informed, the Jews continue the custom still.—This seems a more natural manner of explaining the clause before us, than to suppose with Grotius or Vossius, that they should be accounted the greatest.

(Harm. Ecan. lib. i. cap. 14. § 1.) or Dr. Edwards, (Exercit. on Luke xxii. 21.) that after the paschal lamb they eat another distinct supper; and that this washing happened in the interval between them.—Though Vossius is pleased to call this a very little lamb (anus Agnusculus,) I cannot but think (especially considering how early the eves year in Judea) that it might be big enough plentifully to supply thirteen people: and as all which remained uneaten till morning was to be burnt, (Exod. xii. 10.) one cannot suppose that our Lord would be inclined to multiply dishes on this occasion, especially as the former part of the night was to be spent in watching and prayer.
But Peter is unwilling he should wash his feet.

7 Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do, thou knowest not now: but thou shalt know hereafter.

8 Peter said unto him, Lord, never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me.

9 Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head.

10 Jesus saith to him, He that is washed, needeth not, save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all.

7 [Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do, thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter.

8 Peter saith unto him, Lord, never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me.

9 Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head.

affected at his condescending to perform such a mean office, that he says to him, Lord dost thou go about to wash my feet? It is a thousand times fitter that I should wash thine; nor can I bear to see thee demean thyself thus. Jesus answered and said to him, Thou knowest not now the design of what I am doing, but thou shalt know hereafter; and as I shall presently explain the meaning of this action, so the time will quickly come when many other things in mine undertaking and conduct, much more mysterious than this, shall be cleared up to thee. Yet still Peter refused, and said to him, with more warmth than before, Lord, whatever be the intent of the action, I cannot suffer it by any means, and am determined thou shalt never wash my feet. But Jesus answered him, Alas, Peter, that was rashly spoken! for there is a sense in which, if I do not wash thee, thou hast no portion with me; intimating thereby, that if he were not cleansed from sin by his blood and Spirit, he could never partake of the happiness of his people; and that, in the mean time, it became him to submit in this instance to his direction. Upon which, Simon Peter, struck with so awful an admonition, immediately says to him, with that eager affection so natural to his temper, Lord, if this washing is to be a token of my interest in thee, I most gladly acquiesce in it, and am heartily desirous that thou shouldest wash, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head too; for I desire that all my intellectual and all my executive powers may be sanctified by thy grace, and be entirely devoted to thy service. Then Jesus, willing to lay hold on a hint which gave him an opportunity of pursuing so useful a thought, says further to him, He that is washed already, or that has just been bathing, needs only to wash his feet, which may indeed easily be soiled by the shortest walk, and when that is done, he is entirely clean; as if he should have said, The truly good man needs not that deep repentance and universal change which is absolutely necessary to others that he should, by renewed acts of penitence and faith, cleanse himself from smaller pollutions, which are in some degree inseparable from the finity of human nature: and, in this sense, I know that you, my apostles, are clean; but yet

He that has been bathing. This rendering of the word λύσαμαι is confirmed by Euseb. (Orig. Vol. I. p. 357, 358), and gives as it were a compendious paraphrase upon it. Clarius has well observed that, as the συναποκαθίστης, or room in which they dressed themselves after bathing, was different from that in which they bathed, the feet might be so soiled in walking from one to the other as to make it necessary immediately to wash them again.
He explains his design, and cautions them against ambition.

11 I must add, You are not all so. For as he was acquainted with the secret dispositions of their hearts, so he knew who would betray him (compare John vi. 64, Vol. I. p. 436;) and therefore he said, You are not all clean e, because he knew the heart of Judas was polluted with reigning sin, and was so far enslaved under the power of the devil as to have consented to the perpetration of the vilest wickedness.

12 When therefore he had thus washed their feet, and had taken his upper-garments, and put them on, he sat down at the table again, and said to them, Do you know the meaning and design of what I have now been doing to you in the form of a servant? And, to explain the matter, he said to them, I must again remind you of what I formerly told you, but what you seem so ready to forget (see Mat. xx. 25, 26, and Mark x. 42, 43, p. 135,) The Kings of the Gentiles do indeed lord it over them; and they that exercise the most magisterial and arbitrary authority upon them have a set of flatterers about them who encourage them in it, as an instance of true greatness of mind, and give them the vain title of grand benefactors to nations and men f. But you, my disciples, shall not thus; for you are to shew yourselves the friends of the world, not by governing, but by serving: be not ambitious therefore in contending for superiority, but let him who is eldest among you be as humble and obliging as if he were the youngest and most dependent

11 For he knew who should betray him; therefore said he, Ye are not all clean.

12 So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was set down again, he said unto them, Know ye what I have done to you?

Luke xii. 25 — And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them, are called benefactors.

26 But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve.

e You are not all clean.] Some have observed that Judas did not decline the honour of having his feet washed by Christ, though Peter did; and have considered it as an instance of his pride. But if the discourse between Christ and Peter happened before he came to Judas, it had been indecent for Judas to renew an objection which had just been thus overruled: and if Christ came to Judas before Peter, he might be unwilling to be the first to dispute the point, lest Christ should confound him, by inquiring whether he declined it from a consciousness of any peculiar unworthiness. Guilt naturally suggests such suspicions and precautions.

f [Here the title of benefactors.] It is indeed possible that our Lord may here refer to the title of σαφείς, given to some of the Potemkis and Seleucidae; or to the ambiguity of the Hebrew word שְׂכָה, which (as Boyne has observed) signifies both princes and benefactors; but the general sense given in the paraphrase seems to me much more probable, especially on comparing it with the Syriac version, where there is no such ambiguity, though one would most of all have expected it.

g Who
He gave them an example to do as he had done.

27 For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? Is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth.

John XIII. 13. Ye call me Master, and Lord, and ye say well; for so I am.

14 If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet.

15 For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you.

16 Verily, verily, I say unto you, The servant is not greater than his master; and he that presides over the rest in any office of peculiar trust and influence, [let him be] as humble and condescending as a servant. Of this I have now been giving you an instance, which surely you cannot quickly forget: for which of the two is naturally accounted greater by a stranger who happens to come in, he that sits at the table, or he that stands and waits upon the guests? Is it not evident that it was he that sits at the table? But I am among you as one that washes the rest; and you have just now seen me putting on the form of a servant, and performing to you while you sat at the table one of the lowest offices of menial attendants, in the very garb and gesture in which any of the least of them could appear. You call me indeed your Teacher and Lord; and therein you say well; for [so] I am, and such authority have I received of my Father. Therefore I, who am [your] Lord and Master, and whom you know to be a divinely inspired Teacher, have condescended to so mean an office, and have thus washed your feet, and in all other instances have shewn my readiness in love to serve you, surely you also ought to wash one another's feet, and should be ready to submit to all the humblest offices of mutual friendship. For I have in this instance given you an example, that as I have done to you, you also should do on all proper occasions to one another. And to engage you to the like humanity, Verily, verily, I say unto you, as I have formerly said (Luke vi. 40, and Mat. x. 24, Vol. I. p. 396,) The servant

Who is the eldest among you, &c.] As master is here opposed to young, the youngest, I render it eldest, as it is rendered Rom. ix. 12. See Gen. xxv. 23; I Sam. xviii. 15, Septuag. and compare 1 Kings ii. 22.

h Performing one of the lowest offices, &c.] This was so to a proverb. See 1 Sam. xxiv. 44, and Grootes, in loc.—Dr. Evans well observes, Christian Temper, Vol. I. p. 81) that our Lord chose this kind office, though not absolutely necessary in itself, more strongly to impress the minds of his disciples, and to shew that they ought to regard, not only the necessary preservation, but the mutual comfort of each other.

i I have given you an example, &c.] Some have understood these words as ordaining this to be a continued rite among Christians; and Barclay insists in his Apology (p. 467—470) that this ceremony of washing the feet has as much to recommend it for a standing ordinance of the gospel as either baptism or the breaking of bread. But though some anciently conceived the practice of it to be thus enjoined (see Dr. Cave's Primitive Christianity, book ii. chap. 14), and the Moravian churches still retain it; yet as no such rite as this has ever generally prevailed in the Christian world, and as in many places and circumstances it would be an inconvenience rather than a kindness to do it for our friends, I cannot think these words of our Lord, so plainly capable of another sense, are to be interpreted with so much strictness. See Iríqui Dissert. de Pedilusio, &c.—Into what a farce this is turned at Rome on some occasions may be seen in the Religious Ceremonies of all Nations, Vol. I. p. 417.
Reflections on Christ washing his disciples' feet.

What a mournful reflection is it that corrupt nature should still prevail so far, even in the hearts of such pious men as the apostles in the main were, that after so long a converse with Christ they should still be so unlike him, and bring their eager contentions about superiority, in a state of temporal grandeur they were never to see, into the last hours they spent with their Master, and even to one of the most holy and solemn ordinances of religion! Such are the vain dreams of ambition, and with such empty shadows does it amuse the deluded mind.

But let us turn our eyes to him whom we justly call our Teacher and our Lord; for surely, if any thing can effect a cure, it must be actions and words like these. The great Heir of all things, invested with universal dominion, and just returning to his heavenly Father to undertake the administration of it: in what a habit, in what an attitude, do we see him! Whom would a stranger have taken for the lowest of the company, but him who was high over all created nature? Blessed Jesus, it was not so much any personal attachment to these thy servants, as a regard to the edification of thy whole church, which engaged thee to this astonishing action: that all thy ministers, that all thy people, in conformity to thy example, might learn a readiness to serve each other in love!

But why are we so slow to receive this lesson? And why is our practice often so contrary to it? Surely to cleanse us from these dregs of pride and carnality we need in a spiritual sense to be washed by him. Let us gladly submit to that washing, if we desire to secure any part in him. Which of us in this view may not see reason to cry out with Peter, Lord, not our feet only, but also our hands and our head? May our whole nature be thus purified!
He commends his disciples for their faithfulness to him.

fied! and, warmly emulous of conforming to so bright an example, may we ever be maintaining a watchfulness over our own spirits; correcting the first appearances of irregularity, and washing away every lightest stain which our feet may contract in this various journey! So shall we be great in the sight and favour of our Master; and, numbering ourselves among the least of his servants, shall be distinguished by peculiar honours, in proportion to the degree in which we think ourselves most unworthy of them.

SECT. CLXX.

Christ, while they are eating the paschal lamb, declares that one of his apostles should betray him, and at length marks out Judas as the person, who upon this retires with a resentment which confirmed him in that fatal purpose. Mat. XXVI. 21—25. Mark XIV. 18—21. Luke XXII. 21—23, 28—30. John XIII.—2, 18—30.

Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations:

29 And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me:

30 That ye may eat and

'It appoint unto you a kingdom.]. It is well known that the word ἀναφέροντα properly signifies to covenant, or to bestow in virtue of a covenant; and therefore the last clause of this verse may probably refer to what divines commonly call the covenant of redemption, to which there are so many references in scripture, and concerning the reality of which we could have no doubt if the references were not so express; considering, on the one hand, the great importance of that undertaking of our Lord's to which it refers; and, on the other, the plain declarations of those prophecies which his Spirit suggested, and the confidence with which he has promised those blessings which, as Mediator, it impowers him to bestow. It is therefore astonishing that any should treat it as the creature of a systematic brain. For the engagements in it on Christ's part, see Psal. xl. 6—9. Heb. x. 6—9. Isa. lxi. 1—3. Luke iv. 18. 19. Is. 1. 5. 6. And for those on the part of the Father, see Heb. x. 5. Isa. xi. 2, 3, 1. 8. 9. lii. 13. 15. liii. 10—12. Iv. 4, 5. xlix. 1—10. Luke ii. 31, 32. xxii. 29. 2 Cor. vi. 2. Rev. vii. 16, 17.
He intimates his knowledge that they are not all so.

...those about which you seem so solicitous; let me therefore awaken a nobler ambition in your minds, while I assure you that you may expect to eat and drink at my table in that my kingdom, or to be treated as my distinguished favourites and most intimate friends; yea, and in my final and most triumphant appearance, when I shall sit on the throne of my glory, you may expect to be assessors with me on that grand occasion, and to sit upon thrones as I formerly promised you (Matt. xix. 28), judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and condemning the whole impenitent world for their contempt of that gospel which you, as the chief ministers of my kingdom, are to offer and unfold to them.

But when I speak in this manner of your final honour and happiness, I speak not of you all: I know the real character, and all the most secret views and transactions of those whom I have chosen; and could long ago have fixed a mark of infamy on the traitor, and have put it out of his power to execute his wicked purpose: but, as I chose him to be one of my companions, I leave him to go on, that the scriptures may be fulfilled, which says (Psal. xlii. 9) "He that eateth bread with me, and has been nourished by my care and favour, hath lifted up his heel against me, like an ungrateful brute that kicks at the kind master who feeds him." Such treatment David met with from those whom he trusted; and such I know that I am to expect.

And this I tell you now, before it comes to pass, that when it comes to be accomplished, you may be so far from doubting of the truth of my mission and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

b Judging the twelve tribes of Israel.] The interpretation given of this promise here (and before on Matt. xix. 28, sect. cxxxvi. p. 107) appears to me preferable to that which refers it only, or chiefly, to the power which the apostles had in the Christian church, as the authorized ambassadors of Christ. It by no means implies that Paul and Barnabas, the apostles of the Gentiles, shall be excluded from the honour of being assessors with Christ in his kingdom (compare 1 Cor. vi. 9, 5. Rev. ii. 26, 27. iii. 21) but seems plainly to allude to the courts of judicature among the Jews, where the inferior judges sat in a semicircle round the chief judge, who had his seat in the middle point of it. Compare Rev. iv. 4. xxi. 14.

e He that eateth bread with me, &c.] When these words are so plainly to be found, Psal. xlii. 9, it seems very unnatural, with Mr. Jeffrey (in his Review, p. 187), to imagine they refer to Psal. iv. 12, 13, because something like the sense of them occurs there. Nor is it necessary, with Mr. Pierce (Dissert. iii.), to suppose a transition in these two verses, and render them, I speak not of you all; I know whom I have chosen: but I tell you this before-hand, that when it shall come to pass, the scripture shall be fulfilled, "One that eateth of my bread hath lifted up his heel against me," ye may believe that I am he. Rather think, with Breehuis, that it is an accommodation; and that the sense and connection are to be explained accordingly, as in the paraphrase.
pass, ye may believe that I am he.

20 Verily, Verily, I say unto you, He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me, and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.

21 When Jesus had thus said [—2 The devil having now put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray him,] he was troubled in spirit, and [Mark, as they sat, and did eat, Jesus] testified, and said Verily, verily, I say unto you, That one of you [Mark, which eateth with me] shall betray me.[Luke, and behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me, is with me on the table.] [Mat. xxvi. 21. Mark xiv. 18. Luke xxii. 21. John xiii.—2.]

mission upon that account, that on the contrary, you may more firmly believe that I am [he] that I told you I was even the true Messiah. And, whatsoever therefore I shall suffer, let not your zeal to carry on my cause be lessened, but stedfastly persist in your adherence to it, with a firm persuasion that I will support you in it; for in this view I look upon your interest as my own, and as I formerly declared (Mat. x. 40. sect. lxxvi. and Luke x. 16. sect. xviii.) so now I most assuredly say unto you, Whoever entertains and shews regard to you, or any of my other messengers, as coming in my name, entertains me; and whoever entertains me, entertains him that sent me; as, on the other hand, when you or they are slighted, the affront redounds to me and to my Father.

Now when Jesus had thus said, he made a solemn pause. (The devil, as we observed before, having already, by his vile and pernicious insinuations, put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot, [the son] of Simon, to betray him into the hands of his murderous enemies.) And, as our Lord well knew that Judas was then watching for an opportunity to accomplish his horrid purpose, which he would execute that very night, he was much troubled in spirit to think of so ungrateful and impious a design in one so near him, and so much obliged to him; and as they sat together, and were eating the paschal supper, Jesus openly testified and said with a deep sigh, Verily, verily, I say unto you, That, how incredible soever the hint I just now gave you may seem, one of you who is eating with me in this friendly and intimate manner will quickly betray me to those that thirst for my blood [and] behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is now with me on the table.

Then the disciples were exceedingly grieved to hear of his being betrayed at all, and much more to be told that it should be by one of their own number, while, no one being singled out from the rest, the suspicion lay in common among them; and they looked stedfastly on each other for some 4 The devil having already put it into the heart of Judas, &c.] That Satan entered into Judas before he went to the chief priests, and agreed to betray his Master to them, had been observed before, Luke xxii. 3. p. 270; and that this clause of John xiii. 2. would be inserted here, was intimated in the close of note a, sect. cxix. p. 277, where I accounted for this transposition.

some time in silence, doubting of whom he spake, and studious to observe in whose countenance they might read any peculiar confusion, which might look like an indication of guilt: and, as they none of them knew where to fix it, but the vile wretch himself, they began to inquire among themselves, which of them it could be that was about to do this thing; and, earnestly desirous to be freed from the suspicion of such heinous wickedness, they applied themselves to Christ, and began every one of them to say to him, one by one, Lord, is it I that am this guilty creature? Thou knowest that my very heart abhors the thought, and I hope I shall never be capable of entertaining it,

23 Now one of his disciples, namely John, when Jesus loved him with a peculiar tenderness, and honoured with the most intimate friendship, sat next him at the table, on his right-hand; and, as they were all in a reclining posture, each of them resting on his left elbow, so in the place where John was seated he was leaning on the bosom of Jesus. And as the question was almost gone round, and Jesus made no answer to it, but rather seemed to be swallowed up in mournful contemplation, Simon Peter therefore looked upon John, and beckoned to him with a motion of his head, by which he intimated his desire that he should privately ask him who it might be of whom he spake. He then, lying down closer on the breast of Jesus, that he might put the question without being heard by the rest of the company, secretly whispered and said to him, Lord, who is it?

25 And Jesus answered him with a low voice, It is he to whom I shall give this sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop in a thick kind of sauce made of dates, raisins, and other ingredients beaten together, and properly diluted, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon, putting it towards that part of the dish which e To say to him, one by one, Lord, is it I?] I look on this as a strong proof that the facts mentioned John xiii. 23—26, did not happen a night or two before; for if Christ had then privately marked out Judas to John and Peter as the traitor, the information must surely have reached the rest of the company by this time.

f Beckoned to him with a motion of his head.] This is certainly the import of the word sop, which might more exactly be rendered nodled.

24 Simon Peter therefore beckoned to him, that he should ask who it should be of whom he spake.

25 He then lying on Jesus' breast, saith unto him, Lord, who is it?

26 Jesus answered, He it is to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.
He afterwards reveals the traitor to them all.

Mat. XXVI. 23.—And he answered and said unto them, It is one of the twelve. He that diptheth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me. [Mark xiv. 20.]

The Son of man [indeed] goeth as it is written [Luke, and determined] of him: but wo unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man, if he had not been born. [Mark xiv, 21. Luke xxii, 22.]

He that diptheth his hand with me in the dish. Some very ingenuous persons imagine that Christ by this phrase only declares it was one who sat on the same side of the table with him, and so eat out of the same dish; and, if it were so, there might seem a gradation in the discovery not observable on any other interpretation. But (not to insist upon it) that the lamb, which was to be roasted whole, Exod. xii. 9. was also to be served up in one dish, I cannot but conclude that, if this had been our Lord's meaning, on his saying here (as Mark relates it,) in the same breath, vs. 17. Οὐδὲν ἕως ἕνας of the twelve, he would have added αὐτῷ τὰς ἑξάκολον one of those that dip rather than ὁ μικρῶτας, which plainly signifies the very person that dipeth.

The Son of man is indeed going.] As we often in common speech, say a person is going or gone, to intimate that he is dying or dead, so Elster shews (Observ. Vol. I. p. 119.) that the word ἄγεται has the ambiguity. Compare Josh. xxiii. 14. and Psal. xxxix. 13.—The repetition of that title of the Son of man, which is twice used here in the same verse, has a peculiar energy and dignity, not commonly observed.

It is determined.] As this passage is not liable to the ambiguities which some have apprehended in Acts ii. 23. and iv. 28. (which yet seem, on the whole, to be parallel to it in their most natural construction,) I look upon it as an evident proof, that those things are in the language of scripture said to be determined, or decreed (or exactly bounded and marked out by God, as the word ἀποφαίνει most naturally signifies,) which he sees will in fact happen in consequence of his volitions, without any necessitating agency; as well as those events of which he is properly the author (and, as Besa well expresses it, 2vit sequiter Deum, enunciate same logiatur, we need not fear falling into any impropriety of speech when we use the language which God has taught) I say, without any necessitating agency, because I apprehend that this text, among many others, must entirely overthrow the scheme which Mr. Colliber (in his Inquiry into the Divine existence, p. 97—102.) has so laboriously endeavoured to establish; and which the author of the Persian Letters from Paris, (Letter Ivi.) so confidently asserts, "That where God forces an event he always determines to render it necessary, and so to suspend the moral agency and accountableness of the creature concerned in it." Were this the case, nothing could be more unjust (on the principles of these authors) than to foretell punishments to be inflicted for such actions; which is plainly the case here, and indeed in most other places where evil actions are foretold.
Judas is told, that what he did he should do quickly.

Then Judas, who was indeed the person that betrayed him, answered in some confusion, lest by his silence he should seem to confess his guilt, and said, Master, is it I that shall do this thing, and to whom thou referrest in these severe words? And he said to him, Thou hast said [right;] then art the very person, and I will conceal it no longer.

And after he was thus expressly marked out, not only by the sop which Jesus gave him, but also by the answer which he had returned to his question, Satan entered into him with greater violence, and stirred up in his bosom such indignation and rage at the disgrace he had met with, that he could bear the place no longer; but prepared abruptly to leave it before the table was dismissed, Then Jesus said to him, What you are going to do, do quickly; farther intimating to him his perfect knowledge of the appointment he had made with the chief priests and elders, and admonishing him as it were not to lose the opportunity by over-staying his time. But the reference being thus particular to what none of the company but himself was privy to, no man at the table knew what was his meaning, or for what purpose he spake this to him. For some [of them] thought because Judas had the keeping of the common purse, on which they were to subsist during their stay at Jerusalem, that it was as if Jesus had said to him, Take the first opportunity to buy those sacrifices, and other things, which we shall need for the feast to-morrow and on the following days; or

1 Thou hast said right.] This is plainly the import of the original phrase; It is as thou hast spoken. (See Mat xxi. 63—65. Mark xiv. 61, 62. Luke xxii. 70. John xviii. 37.) Thus, Now you say something, signifies among us, You speak right.

25 Then Judas which betrayed him, answered and said, Master, is it I? He said unto him, Thou hast said.

28 Now no man at the table knew for what intent he spake this unto him.

29 For some of them thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the feast; or that he should give something to the poor.
or that perhaps he intended he should give something to the poor, which Christ used to do, though their stock was so small; but always did it in a very private manner, which made it the more probable that he should only give such an oblique hint of that intention. Of this they thought, rather than of any bad design of Judas; for they did not imagine that, if he was to prove the traitor, his wickedness could immediately take place; or that he was so utterly abandoned as to go away to accomplish it with those awful words of his master sounding as it were, in his ears.

But he was capable of committing the crime, even with this aggravation; and therefore having, as was said, received the sop, he immediately went out without any farther reply; and as it was night, which was the time he had appointed to meet those who were consulting the death of Jesus, under the covert of it he went to them, and fulfilled his engagements, in a few hours after, by delivering his Master into their hands.

IMPROVEMENT.

Who would not gladly continue with Christ in the strictest fidelity, amidst all the trials which can arise, when he observes how liberally he repays his servants and how graciously he seems to relish his own honours the more, in proportion to the degree in which those honours are shared with them; appointing them a glorious kingdom, and erecting thrones for each of them? 29, 30 And surely, though the apostles of the Lamb are to have their peculiar dignity in the great day of his triumph, there is a sense in which he will perform to every one that overcometh, that yet more condescending promise, I will grant him to sit down with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne. (Rev. iii. 21.) Let our souls in that confidence be strengthened to all the labours and sufferings to which he may call us forth.

It is a melancholy reflection, that there should be any one in this select company, to whom this endearing promise did not belong; especially one who, having eaten of Christ's bread, should in such a sense and degree as Judas, lift up his heel against him. 13.

and 2 Chron. xxxv. 7—9.) And if this be admitted, it will obviate the most plausible argument for Grotius' opinion, which is that taken from John xviii. 28. Others grounded on John xiii. 1, 2. xix. 14. and Mat. xxvi. 5. are obviated in the paraphrase or notes on those places, as the attentive reader will easily perceive.
Deliver us, O Lord, from any share in that guilt! We are treated as thy friends; we are set at thy table: let us not ungratefully kick against thee, while the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; (Isa. i. 3.)

If we would not do it, let us be jealous over ourselves with a godly jealousy. Happy are they whose hearts witness to their sincerity in the presence of him that searches them, and can cheerfully say, Lord is it I? Let them say it humbly too; lest the infirmity of nature prevail upon them beyond their present purpose or apprehension, and lead them on to do that, the very thought of which they would now abhor.

How artfully must Judas have conducted himself, when on such an intimation no particular suspicion appears to have fallen on him! But how vain is that artifice, be it ever so refined, which, while it preserves a character in the sight of men, cannot in the least degree impose upon Christ! The day will come when he will lay open the false and ungrateful hypocrite, in a more overwhelming manner than that in which he here exposed Judas; and whatever advantage he may have gained, either by professing religion, or by betraying it, he will undoubtedly find that it had been good for him that he never had been born.

One would have imagined that an admonition like this, which laid bare the secrets of his heart, and warned him so plainly and faithfully of his danger, might have wrought some remorse in his heart, or at least have proved some impediment to the immediate execution of his design: but, being now given up by the righteous judgment of God to the influence of Satan, and the lust of his own depraved mind, he is exasperated, rather than reclaimed by it; and immediately goes forth, under the covert of the night, to hasten the accomplishment of that work of darkness, the consequences of which had been so awfully represented. O Lord, let thy grace, and thy love, do that for us which thy terrors alone cannot do! Let our hearts be melted by that nobler principle, and taught to abhor every thing which would displease thee! Oh, let them flow forth into such workings of compassion to the afflicted as engaged the blessed Jesus to relieve the poor out of his own little stock; and into those sentiments of candor which would not permit the apostles, even after this admonition, to imagine Judas altogether so bad as indeed he was, but led them to put the mildest construction on their Master's ambiguous address to him! Such may our mistakes be, wherever we do mistake; the errors of a charity, which would not by excessive rigour injure the vilest sinner, and much less the least and weakest of God's servants!
SECT. CLXXI.

Christ, having exhorted his disciples to mutual love, forewarns them of their approaching trial, and foretells Peter's fall, immediately before the eucharist. Luke XXII. 31—34. John XIII. 31, to the end.

JOHN XIII. 31.

It was observed in the preceding section how Judas, being marked out both by Christ's actions and his words, quit the place in a mixture of rage and confusion: when therefore he was thus gone out, Jesus said to the rest of his disciples as they sat at the table with him. Now is the Son of man just on the point of being glorified far more remarkably than ever; and God in a most illustrious manner is to be glorified in him, by the signal and extraordinary circumstances of his abasement and exaltation. And if you may assure yourselves, that if God be glorified in him, God will also glorify him in and with himself, in such a degree as shall in the most convincing manner declare his intimate relation to him; and the time will presently come when he will eminently glorify him: for the Son of man is very shortly to enter on the honours of his celestial and universal kingdom, and in the mean time, some rays of Divine glory shall shine through all that cloud of ignominy, reproach, and distress, which shall surround him.

My dear little children, whom I love even with parental tenderness, and whom my heart pities under all your trials and sorrows, it is yet but a very little while longer that I am to continue with you; a few hours more will part us: and when I am gone, ye shall seek me, and wish for my presence and converse; but, as I said to the Jews, that whither I go, ye cannot come (John vii. 34; and viii. 21, Vol. I. p. 519, 533;) so now I say to you, Ye cannot as yet come to the place a When therefore he was gone out.] The reader will observe that, if the former reasoning relating to the ordT of this part of the story be just, Judas certainly went out before the eucharist was instituted. And indeed one cannot reasonably suppose

John XIII. 31.

32 If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straight-way glorify him.

33 Little children, yet a little while I am with you; Ye shall seek me; and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say unto you.
place whither I am going. But observe my parting words, and let them be written on your very hearts; for I give it you as a new commandment, and press you by new motives and a new example to a duty which hitherto, alas, has been too little regarded; and from henceforth would have you to consider it as confirmed by a new sanction, and to keep it ever fresh in your memories; That ye love one another with a most sincere and ardent affection, such as mankind have never known before; yea, I would now enjoin you, even as I have loved you, that ye also would love one another, with a friendship which may carry you through such difficulties and sufferings as I am going to endure for you all. This will be the most acceptable and the most ornamental taken of your relation to me; and I recommend it to you, as the noblest badge of your profession; for by this shall all men know that you are my disciples indeed, if they see you have that lively and generous love for each other which nothing but my gospel can be sufficient to inspire.

On this Jesus paused, that they might have an opportunity to reflect seriously on the important charge he had given them. And Simon Peter, touched with what he had said of his being ready to go whither they could not come, said to him, Lord, permit us to inquire, whither art thou going?

b A new commandment.] I apprehend this expression signifies much more than merely a renewed command. (Compare 1 John ii. 7, 8; and 2 John ver. 5.) It seems a strong and lively intimation that the engagements to mutual love, peculiar to the Christian dispensation, are so singular, and so cogent, that all other men, when compared with its votaries, may seem uninstructed in the school of friendship, and Jesus may appear, as it were, the first professor of that Divine science. Jamblichus Vit. Pythag. cap. 33) seems very injuriously to have preferred the Pythagoreans to all other men on that account; but it may be observed, that both he and Eupapius, like many moderns, seem to have had very little regard to truth when falsehood might cast a slur on Christianity. Dr. Clarke well observes that our Lord seems to have laid this peculiar stress on charity, as foreseeing that general corruption and destruction of true Christianity, which the want of it would cause among those that should call themselves his church. (Clark's Sermons, Vol. III. p. 297)—Rophelius (Annot. ex Aen. p. 137—139) has the best note I ever saw on the passage, though I think it hardly reaches the full spirit of it; in which he shews that Xenophon calls the laws of Lycurgus lasvèllas vòzox, very new laws, several hundred years after they were made; because, though they had been communed by other nations, they had not been practised by them. Perhaps our Lord may here insinuate a reflection, not only on that party spirit which prevailed so much in the Jews, but likewise on the emulations and contentions among the apostles themselves, which mutual love would easily have cured. In this sense it is still a new commandment to us, who generally act as we had not yet got time to learn, or even to read it.

c The noblest badge of your profession.] It is well known that the founders of new societies appoint some peculiar ornament, sign, or mode of living, by which their followers may be known from others. This seems to be here alluded to.

34 A new commandment I give unto you. That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.

35 By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.

36 Simon Peter said unto him, Lord, whither goest thou? Jesus answered him, Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now; but...
On Peter's confidence, Jesus foretells his fall.

"But thou shalt follow me afterwards." I am ready to think our Lord here obliquely hints at what he afterwards farther signified in his command to Peter after his resurrection, when he ordered him to follow him (John xxi. 18, 19, sect. 66); namely, that Peter should die on the cross for his sake; which ancient history assures us that he did, See Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 1.

37 Peter said unto him, Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? I will lay down my life for thy sake.

But Jesus answered him, Wilt thou indeed so readily lay down thy life for my sake? Alas, thou knowest not thine own weakness, or thou wouldst never talk thus confidently.

And the Lord added with great earnestness, and said, O Simon, Simon, I must tell thee, that an hour of terrible trial is just at hand, which will press harder than thou art aware on thee, and on all thy companions here: for behold, Satan, as in the case of Job (Job ii. 4, 5), has requested of God a permission to assault you, all by furious and violent temptations, that he may toss you up and down, and sift you like wheat in a sieve: (compare Amos ix. 9.) But I, foreseeing the danger to which thou, Peter, wilt peculiarly be exposed, have graciously prevented thee with the tokens of my friendly care, and have prayed to my Father for thee, that he would communicate to thee such supplies of grace that thy faith may not utterly fail, and sink under the violent shock it is to receive: and let me now exhort thee, that when thou art returned from those wanderings, into which I know thou wilt fall, to the paths of wisdom and duty, thou would be sure to make it thine immediate care to strengthen thy brethren; and do thine utmost, all the remainder of thy days, to..."
Reflections on Christ's care of his apostles.

to engage all over whom thou hast any influence, to a steady adherence to my cause, in the midst of the greatest difficulties.

And such was still the confidence that Peter had of his own steadfastness and zeal, that he said to him, with renewed eagerness and warmth, Lord, what I said but now is the deliberate sentiment and resolution of my heart: lead me therefore whether thou pleasest: for I am ready to go with thee, both into prison, and to death itself; and whatsoever I may suffer by continuing with thee, none of the most cruel of thine enemies shall ever be able to part us.

34 But Jesus, that he might convince him of his weakness, and prevent his ever trusting in his own heart again, said to him, Peter, I know the sincerity of thine intention, yet I most assuredly say unto thee, It shall not be the time of cock-crowing to-day, before thou shalt be so terrified at the faces of these enemies whom thou now defest, that thou shalt thrice deny that thou so much as knowest me, and shalt solemnly disclaim all regard to me. (Compare Mat. xxvi. 34, and Mark xiv. 30, sect. clxxxi.)

IMPROVEMENT.

ALAS, how ready are we to forget ourselves; and how much safer are we in Christ's hands than in our own! How frequently do we resolve like Peter, and in how many instances do we [Make it thine immediate care, &c.] I can see no objection against taking the charge in this comprehensive sense; and as I question not but Peter, after he had kept his fall so bitterly, as we know he did, applied himself to rally his dispersed brethren, and to prevent their fleeing from Jerusalem, till the third day was over, in the morning of which he was up betimes, and early at the sepulchre of our Lord: (see John xx. 2, 3, sect. cxxiv.) So indeed the strain of his epistles shews his long and affectionate remembrance of this solemn charge. Many passages of the first are peculiarly intended to animate his Christian brethren to a courageous adherence to Christ amidst the greatest dangers, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7; ii. 19, 20; iii. 14—13; iv. 12—19; v. 8, 9, 10; and the second has several cautions to guard them against the seductions of error, in some instances more to be dreaded than the terrors of the severest persecution. 2 Pet. i. 10, 12; ii. 1, 2, 20, 21; iii. 2, 17.

53 And he said unto him, Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison, and to death.

54 And he said, [Verily, verily, I say unto thee] Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me. [John XIII.—38.]

55 It shall not be the time of cock-crowing to-day.] A careful perusal of sect. clxxxi. compared with this, will shew why I have not here brought in the account which Matthew and Mark have given us of Christ's admonitions to Peter and his brethren on this head; which appear to be the renewal of this some hours after. As it is plain from thence and the event, that the cock actually crow before Peter's third denial, we must certainly take the words of Luke and John, as in this version, for the common time of cock-crowing, which probably did not come till after the cock which Peter heard had crossed the second time, and perhaps oftener. For it is well known those vigilant animals, on any little disturbance, often crow at midnight, or before it; though they do not come from their roost till about three in the morning, which was usually called the cock-crowing. (Mark xiii. 35.) See Dr. Whibley's note on Mat. xxvi. 34.
we fall like him! We see the malice of Satan, and how eagerly he desired to try the apostles, and even to sift them as wheat: we see also the gracious care of our Redeemer, who, foreseeing the danger of his servants, laid in an unsought remedy, to which they respectively owed their security, or their recovery.

Let us rejoice that the great enemy is under such restraints, and can have no power against us, unless by permission from above. Let us rejoice that Christ is a constant and invariable Friend to his people; and still appears as an Advocate with the Father, and as a tender faithful Shepherd, watching over them for good, while Satan is seeking to devour them. (1 Pet. v. 8.) If at any time that adversary get an advantage over us, let us endeavour in the strength of Divine grace an immediate recovery; and when restored, let us exert ourselves to strengthen our brethren: for surely it is most reasonable that we, who are surrounded with such various, and such sensible infirmities, should have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way. (Heb. v. 2.)

In this instance, as in all others, let us be mindful of the dying charge, the new commandment of our dear Lord; and let us shew upon all occasions this distinguishing badge of our relation to him, even our love to each other. So will our profession be adorned, and the Son of man be farther glorified, by the conduct of his servants on earth: so shall he at length glorify us with himself, and after a short absence call us to follow him into those regions of perfect love which must of course be the seats of everlasting joy.

In the mean time, send down, O gracious Emmanuel, thy Spirit of love on all thy followers; that we may no longer glory in the little distinctions of this or that party, but may shew we are Christians by this resplendent ensign of our order! May we bind it on our shoulders as a mark of honour, and wear it as a crown upon our heads; that the spirit of hatred, reproach, and persecution may vanish like an unworthy mist before the sun, and it may again be universally said, as of old, Behold, how these Christians love one another! Amen,

SECT. CLXXII.

Christ, at the conclusion of the passover, institutes the eucharist.

Mat. XXVI. 26.

AND as they were eating, Jesus took bread; [Luke, and gave thanks,] SUCH was the admonition that Christ gave to Peter, and such was his discourse with his disciples while they were at supper: and now, as they were eating, or just as they had finished, the paschal supper, Jesus took a cake of bread; and having in a solemn manner given thanks to his heavenly Father, and blessed [it], that is having implored the Divine blessing on it, and on the ordinance then to be instituted, that it might in all succeeding ages tend to the edification and comfort of his people; he broke the bread into several pieces and gave some of [it] to each of the disciples present, and said, Take this bread, and eat it with reverence and thankfulness; for this is my body, that is, it is the sensible sign and representation of my body, which is freely given, and is specif-icly to be broken, bruised, wounded, and even slaughtered for you. Do this hereafter, in your assemblies for religious worship, in a pious and affectionate commemoration of thanks, and blessed is, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body, [Luke, which is given you: this do in remembrance of me.] [Mark xiv. 22, Luke xxii. 19.]

1. Just as they had finished the paschal supper. Many rabbis and other rabbis tell us that it was a rule among the Jews, at the end of the supper, to take a piece of the bread for the last thing they eat that night. (See Almonworth, as quoted before, note c, p. 276.) If this custom was as old as Christ's time, it would make this action so much the more remarkable. It would plainly show that the bread here distributed was a very distinct thing from the meal they had been making together; and might be, in the first opening of the action, a kind of symbolic intimation that the Jewish passover was to give way to another and nobler divine institution.

2. Blessed [it]. It is not expressly said in the original that Christ blessed it, that is, the bread (nor indeed that he brake it); but it is very reasonable to imagine that this thanksgiving was attended with a prayer that the Divine blessing might accompany the bread. And it is so very plain from 1 Cor. x. 16, that the apostles taught Christians to bless the cup, that I cannot but wonder that one of the most accurate and penetrating writers of our age should scruple to allow that Christ blessed the sacramental elements. The same word is used in Mat. xiv. 19, Mark vi. 41, viii. 7, and Luke ix. 16, where it is certain an extraordinary blessing attended the bread and fishes in answer to his prayers. (See also Mark x. 16. Luke ii. 32, and Gen. ii. 3. Septuag.) It would indeed be absurd to interpret this of his concerning a virtue on bread so set apart, to work as a charm, either on men's bodies or souls; but I hope few Christians are so ill instructed as to imagine this to be the case in the eucharist; and all wise and faithful ministers will, no doubt, be solicitous to preserve them from so wild and mischievous a notion.

3. This is my body. When I consider that (as a thousand writers have observed) on the same foundation on which the Papists argue for transubstantiation from these words, they might prove, from Ezek. v. 1—5, that the prophet's hair was the city of Jerusalem; from John x. 9, and xv. 1, that Christ was literally a door and a vine; and from Mat. xxvi. 27, 28, and 1 Cor. xi. 23, that the cup was his blood, and that Christ commanded his disciples to drink and swallow the cup; I cannot but be astonished at the inference they would deduce from hence. Had Irenæus or Epiphanius reported such a thing of any sect of ancient heretics now extinct, one would have been so candid to human nature as to suppose the historian misinformed. As it is, one is almost tempted to suspect it to be the effect of arrogance rather than error; and to consider it as a mere insolent attempt to show the world, in the strongest instance they could invent, what monstrous things the clergy should dare to say, which the wretched laity should not dare to contradict; nay, which they should be forced to pretend they believed. In this view the thought is admirable, and worthy the most malicious wit that ever for'd it over the heritage of G. d. But it may deserve some serious reflection, whether it be not an instance of infatuation, to which God has given them up, that it may be a plain mark to all that will use common sense, of the grossest error in a church which claims infallibility; and may not be intended by Providence as a kind of antidote against the rest of its poison.
of me, that you may keep up the memory of my dying love, may openly profess your dependence on my death, and impress your hearts with a becoming sense of it. (Compare 1 Cor. xi. 24.)

And in like manner, after they had supped, he took the cup⁴, that is, another cup different from that which he had before divided among them (Luke xxii. 17. p. 275) ; and when he had given thanks to his heavenly Father, and implored his blessing upon it, as a solemn sacramental sign, he gave [it] to them, and said, Drink ye all of it, that is, of the wine which it contains: and accordingly they all drank some of it. For said he to them, as he delivered it into their hands, This cup of wine is a representation of my blood [even] of that blood which is the great basis of the new covenant, [or] is itself the seal of the new covenant, established in my blood, which is shed for you, and for many more, as the great ransom to be paid.

After they had supped he also took the cup.] A learned divine of the establishment, who has favoured me with many sheets of accurate remarks on this work (which were of so great use to me in correcting it for the second edition as to demand my public acknowledgments), has objected to the supposition here made of its being another cup, which I have asserted in the paraphrase. But, with all due deference to his penetration (which is indeed very great), I must beg leave to observe, that it still appears more probable to me that it was as I there represent it; not merely because Luke mentions a cup taken before the bread (Luke xxii. 17. p. 275), but because in the passage before us (ver. 20), he adds to that the mention of a cup after it. It is well known the Jews used several cups of wine at the passover, and one of them with the antepast, at the very beginning of the feast. (See note c on Mark xiv. 17. p. 274.) I know not how far so accurate a writer as St. Luke might farther intimate this distinction by using the word ἐκχυσμός (ver. 17) with respect to the first cup, which strictly expresses receiving it from the hand of another, probably of the servant who waited at the table; whereas ἐκχυστής (tasting) is the word used ver. 19, of which ἐκχυστής here in ver. 20 is governed; which might have been equally proper, if the cup stood on the table before him, as the bread used in the eucharist probably did.

The seal of the new covenant.] It seems very evident that when the sacramental cup here, and in 1 Cor. xi. 25, is called the new covenant, it must signify the seal of it; just as when circumcision is called God's covenant, Gen. xvii. 10, and it is there said, ver. 13, My covenant shall be in your flesh, we must understand the seal of it: and if by the seal of the covenant be meant, as I here explain it, and as most take it, an appointed token of our accepting that covenant, and of God's favour to us on supposition of the sincerity of that acceptance, it is so plain that the eucharist, as well as baptism, is such a seal, that they who disapprove the word deny not the thing. (See the Plain Account of the Lord's Supper, p. 168, 169.) I have rendered the word ἐκχυσμόν, covenant, rather than testament or will, because it is evidently the more usual signification of the word; and because the old covenant, to which the new is opposed, cannot with any propriety be called a testament, with reference to the death of any testator, which is the idea chiefly insisted on by those who would retain our common version here. And, by the way, it appears on this principle that the title of our Bible is improperly and obscurely rendered, by a piece of complaisance to the old Latin version, of which they were by no means worthy; and which they cannot at all the better deserve for that sanction which the papal authority has given to one of them, though it seems thereby to have been preferred to the original.

Note a. (Luke, like- wise also) he took the cup, [Luke, after supper,] and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it! [and they all drank of it.] (Mark xiv. 23.) [Luke xxii. 20.—]

23 For [he said unto them.] This [Luke, cup] is my blood of the new testament [Luke, or the new testament] [in my blood], which is shed [Luke, for you and] paid for the forgiveness of sins; receive it therefore with a firm resolution to comply with the engagements of that covenant, and with a cheerful hope of its invaluable blessings: and do this, as often as ye drink it, in a thankful commemoration of me, and with a proper care to distinguish between this and a common meal, appropriating what you do in this ordinance entirely to a religious purpose. (Compare 1 Cor. xi. 25.) And then our Lord repeated what he had said as they were sitting down to supper (Luke xxii. 18. p. 275), Verily, I say unto you, That from this time I will drink no more of this produce of the vine, until that day when I shall drink it new with you in the kingdom of God my Father; that is, till, being risen from the dead, I have received my mediatorial kingdom, and we shall share together in much nobler entertainments than earth can afford, even in its highest religious solemnities, which shall then be happily superseded.

And when, according to the usual custom at the close of the passover, they had sung an hymn of praise to God at the conclusion of the eucharist, and had passed some remaining time in those discourses, and in that prayer, which will be for many, for the remissions of sins.

But verily I say unto you, I will no more drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in the kingdom of my Father. [Mark xiv. 25.]

And when they had sung an hymn, they went out unto the resurrection (Acts x. 41), he did not make use of wine. Perhaps their poverty might not allow them often to drink it; and we do not find that he was ever present at any feast; at least we are sure he never celebrated another passover with them. Nor does it appear that he partook of the eucharist with them, or ever administered it, but at this time of its institution.

\[ ^{a} \text{In my blood, which is shed—as the great ransom to be paid for the forgiveness of sins.} \]

I apprehend this ordinance of the eucharist to have so plain a reference to the atonement or satisfaction of Christ, and to do so solemn an honour to that fundamental doctrine of the gospel, that I cannot but believe that while this sacred institution continues in the church (as it will undoubtedly do to the end of the world) it will be impossible to root that doctrine out of the minds of plain humble Christians by all the little artifices of such forced and unnatural criticisms as those are by which it has been attacked. Unprejudiced and honest simplicity will always see the analogy this ordinance has to eating the flesh of the Son of God, and drinking his blood; and will be taught by it to feed on him as the lamb that was slain by the gracious appointment of God to take away the sins of the world. The enemies of this heart-reviving truth might as well hope to pierce through a coat of mail with a straw as to reach such a truth, defended by such an ordinance as this, by any of their trifling sophistries.

\[ ^{b} \text{An hymn of praise to God.} \]

The hymn that was usually sung by the Jews at the passover is what they call the Hallel, which began at Psal. cxiii., and ended with Psal. cxviii., some of which psalms might be used by our Lord at the close of the eucharist, as very suitable to this occasion; though it is uncertain whether (as Grotius and some others think) it might not be some other hymn, more closely adapted to the celebration of the eucharist. I thought it proper here to conclude the story of the passover, and to mention their going out, though that did not immediately follow on their singing the hymn. Some such little anticipations seem to me an advantage rather than an imperfection in any harmony, especially when attended with a paraphrase, or notes, and divided into such short sections as those must be which are intended for the use of families.

IMPROVEMENT.

Let us now review, with most thankful acknowledgment, this gracious legacy of our dying Redeemer, this reviving and nourishing ordinance, which he instituted for the benefit of his church the same night in which he was betrayed: (1 Cor. xi. 23.) So tenderly did his love for them prevail when his heart was full of his own sorrows: May we always consider to what purposes this holy rite was ordained; and as we shall see the wisdom of the appointment, so we shall also be both awakened to attend to it, and assisted in that attendance!

It is the memorial of the death of Christ, by which we represent it to others, and to ourselves. May we be ever ready to give this most regular and acceptable token, that we are not ashamed to fight under the banner of a crucified Redeemer!—It is also the seal of the new covenant in his blood. Let us adore the grace that formed and ratified that everlasting covenant, so well ordered in all things, and so sure; (2 Sam. xxiii. 5.) And whenever we approach to this sealing ordinance may we renew our consent to the demands of that covenant, and our expectation of those blessings which are conveyed by it! a consent and expectation so well suited to the circumstance of its being ratified by the blood of Jesus.
Thus may every attendance nourish our souls in grace, and ripen them for glory; that at length all may be fulfilled and perfected in the kingdom of God.

In the mean time may God, by the influences of his Spirit, give to all professing Christians right notions of this ordinance, and a due regard for it; that, on the one hand, none may, under the specious pretence of honouring it; live in the habitual neglect of so plain and important a duty; and that, on the other, it may never be profanely invaded by those who have no concern about the blessings of that covenant it ratifies, and impiously prostitute it to those secular views, above which it was intended to raise them!
And may none that honour the great Author of it encourage such an abuse, lest they seem to lay the very cross of Christ as the threshold to the temple of those various idols to which ambitious and interested men are bowing down their souls!
Christ warns his disciples of approaching danger.

SECT. CLXXIII.

Christ, having warned his apostles of the dangers to which they would be exposed, comforts them with the views of future happiness, and with the assurance of his own gracious presence, and that of his Father, in the way to it. Luke XXII. 35—38. John XIV. 1—14.

 LUKE XXII. 35.
Though we mentioned Christ's going out to the mount of Olives, after he had instituted the eucharist, it is very material to observe, that before he quitted the guest-chamber in which he had supped, he entertained his disciples with some large and affectionate discourses, and put up an excellent prayer with them, which we shall now relate. And, to introduce these discourses, he said to them, When I sent you my apostles, out on your important embassy some time ago, without either purse to supply you with money, or scrip to take provisions with you, or shoes besides those on your feet, (Mat. x. 9, 10. Vol. I. p. 391.) did you want any thing necessary for the support of life? And they said, No, Lord, we very well remember that the care of providence over us was such that we wanted nothing; but wherever we came we found the hearts of strangers opened even with surprising freedom to assist and relieve us.

36 Then he said to them, This was indeed the case in your former mission; but now you must expect much harder usage than before, and will be exposed to greater sufferings and dangers in the prosecution of your ministry; and therefore let him that has a purse take [it.] and also a scrip, if he has one; and let him that has no sword be ready even to sell his garment and buy one with the price of it: so long a journey, and so sharp a conflict, is before you, that you had need be well armed and furnished for it.

37 For I assure you, That my enemies are now about to apprehend me as a malefactor, and, after all the love that I have shewn to an ungrateful world, this remarkable prophecy, which is written concerning me, (Isa. liii. 12.) must yet be accomplished in me, "And he was numbered with the transgressors:" for indeed all the things which are written concerning me in

36. Then said he unto them, But now be that hath a purse let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one.

37. For I say unto you, That this that is written must yet be accomplished in me, And he was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning me have an end.
He was going to prepare a place for them.

23 And they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And he said unto them, It is enough.

John XIV. 1. Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God; believe also in me.

2 In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you: I go to prepare a place for you.

a Here are two swords.] Probably (as Mr. Cradock conjectures, in his Harmony, part ii. p. 209.) some of the apostles brought these swords along with them, in their journey from Galilee and Peræa, to defend them against robbers. It afterward appears that one of them was Peter's. See John xviii. 10. sect. cxviii.

b My chief intent is to direct you to another kind of defence, &c.] This is strongly intimated by his saying, Two swords were enough; for they could not be sufficient to arm eleven men.

c Believe in God, believe also in me.] πιστεύτε ἐν τῷ θεῷ, καὶ ἐν τῷ πρωτοτύπῳ. These words are so very ambiguous that (as Erasmus observes) they may be rendered as here; or as our English translation; or Ye believe in God, and ye believe in me; or Believe in God; and ye believe in me; and different commentators have taken them in all these very different senses. But it appears most natural to render πιστεύτε alike in both places; and it is certain an exhortation to faith in God, and in Christ, would be very seasonable, considering how weak and defective their faith was. (See ver. 9.)—The transition from the passage in Luke to this in John appears so easy, placing the paragraphs in this order, that I wonder no harmonizers should have observed it before.

d In my Father's house, are many mansions.] Mr Le Moyne thinks Christ alludes to the various apartments in the temple, and the vast number of persons lodged there. Μοναῖς signifies quiet and continued abodes, and therefore seems happily expressed by our English word mansions; the etymology and exact import of which is just the same.
The prospect of their future happiness should comfort them.

5 And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that, as he said, I will come again, and receive you to myself, that, as

And if not, I would have told you.] Heinsius's version of these words seems much less natural: he would connect and render them, μὴ ἐπίσημον ἔκ τε μνήμης &c. as if our Lord had said, "Had it not been so, I would have spoken in another manner, and have told you, I am going to prepare a place for you; but now I have no reason to say that, the place being already prepared." But it is hard to say what sense can be made of ver. 3. on this interpretation.—That the pious Jews considered all the glories of the Messiah's kingdom as introductory to the happiness of a future state of eternal glory, appears from a variety of scriptures; and indeed it is difficult to say how they could think otherwise, considering how much this had been insisted on; or how they could have been good and pious, had not this been their chief aim. Compare Mat. iii. 13, v. 8, 12, vi. 20, vii. 21, xii. 43, xix. 16, xxii. 30. Luke xiv. 14. xvi. 9. John iii. 15, 36, vi. 54, 63. xi. 24—27. [I am going to prepare a place for you.] When the glory of heaven is spoken of as prepared before the foundation of the world (Mat. xxv. 34.) this only refers to the Divine purpose; but as that was founded in Christ's mediatorial undertaking, (Eph. i. 4—6.) it might properly be said that, when Christ went into heaven as our High-priest, to present (as it were) his own blood before the Father on our account, and as our Forerunner to take possession of it, he did thereby prepare a place for us; which the apostle expresses, (Heb. ix. 28, 24.) by his purifying or consecrating the heavenly places in which we are to dwell, which would have been considered as polluted by the entrance of such sinful creatures into them; as the tabernacle when new made was, by having passed through the hands of sinners, on which account an atonement for the altar itself, which was considered as most holy, was the first act performed in it when it was opened. (Exod. xxix. 36, 37.) And an atonement for the whole tabernacle, as polluted by the access of sinners to it, was to be repeated annually, Lev. xvi. 16. It may not however be improper to observe, that the word τοίς is often translated room, (Luke ii. 7. xiv. 10, 22. 1 Cor. iv. 16.) and thus the signification here may be, that Christ went to heaven to make room for them, or to remove those things out of the way, which obstructed their entrance. This must at least be included; though the word διαθήκη may perhaps express still more.

And I will come again, &c.] This coming ultimately refers to Christ's solemn appearance at the last day to receive all his servants to glory; yet (as was hinted before in note t, on Luke xii. 40. Vol. I. p. 582.) it is a beautiful circumstance that the death of every particular believer, considering the universal power and providence of Christ, (Rev. i. 18.) may be regarded as Christ's coming to fetch him home; whereas Satan is spoken of as having naturally the power of death, Heb. ii. 14. If he
as we are now united in so dear a friendship, you also after a short separation, may be where I am and may dwell for ever with me. And surely I may say in the general, after all the instructions I have given you, that you know whither I am going; and you know the way that leads thither, and by which you may safely follow me; which I exhort you therefore that you would resolutely keep.

But such was still the expectation that his 5 disciples had of his erecting a temporal kingdom, that Thomas, upon hearing this, says to him, Lord, thou hast never yet informed us of the place, and we know not so much as whither thou art going, "and how then can we possibly know the way thither? Jesus says to him, I have already intimated to you I am going to the Father; and did you but consider this, you would soon see that I am myself the Way, and the Truth, and the Life; that I am to guide, instruct, and animate my followers in their passage to eternal glory, and that their progress will be sure and vigorous in proportion to the steadiness of their faith in me, and the constancy of their regards to me: and this indeed is the true and only way you can take; for no man cometh to the knowledge or enjoyment of the Father, to whom I am returning, but by means of me, whose proper office it is to introduce sinful creatures to his presence and favour. If, therefore, you had known me aright, you would surely have known my Father also, in whose glory my ministrations so evidently centre; and such indeed are the discoveries that I have made of him, and such the manifestations of the Divine per-fections which you have seen in me, that in effect it may be said that from henceforth you know him, and have as it were already seen him.

Then Philip, one of the apostles, hearing these 8 words, says to him, with a pious ardour becoming his character, Lord, do but shew us the Father

4 And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know.

5 Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest and how can we know the way?

6 Jesus saith unto him, I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me.

7 If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from hence-forth ye know him, and have seen him.

8 Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us.

[b] We know not whither thou art going.] It is probable Thomas might think that Christ intended to remove to some splendid palace on earth, to set up his court there for a while, before he received his people to the celestial glory.

[1] I am the way, &c.] Our Lord had so lately delivered the same sentiment in language much like this (John x. 9, p. 33), that it might well have been expected they should have understood him now.

[k] If you had known me, you would have known my Father also.] This is a most important truth; but it does not determine to what degree he must be explicitly known, in order to receive saving benefits by him.

1 Lord
ther, and bring us to the sight and enjoyment of him; and it is happiness enough for us; we desire no more, and resign every other hope in comparison of this.

Jesus says to him, Have I been with you then so long a time, and conversed among you in so familiar a manner for successive years, and hast thou not yet known me, Philip? if thou hadst well considered who I am, thou mightest have better understood what I have now been saying; for he that has seen me, has in effect seen the Father, as I am the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, Heb. 1. 3: And how dost thou say, after all that has passed between us, Shew us the Father?

10 Dost thou not then believe, though I have before affirmed it so expressly (John x. 38, p. 91), that I am in the Father, and the Father is in me, by so intimate an union as to warrant such language as this? The words which I speak to you from time to time, in which I discover and inculete this important truth, I speak not merely of myself; but it is really the Father who dwells in me that gives me my instructions thus to speak; and it is he that operates together with me; and performs the miraculous works that you have so often seen, which are sufficient to demonstrate the truth of this assertion, mysterious as it is, and incredible as it might otherwise seem. Believe me therefore in what I have said, that I am thus in the Father, and the Father is in me; or if what you have so long known of my general character and veracity will not engage you to take it merely on my single testimony, at least believe me on account of those works in which you have so frequently beheld the Father acting with me, and which indeed afford so obvious an argument of it, that one might imagine the sight of a few of them might convince one that was before a stranger to me.

12 And yet verily, verily, I say unto you, That you

Lord, shew us the Father.] The explication given in the paraphrase seems to me a more probable sense than that in which Mr. Fleming understands it; as if Philip had said, "Let us have a vision of the Father in a corporal form, to testify the necessity of thy removal from us." (See Fleming's Chrmolog, Vol. II. p. 202.) I cannot apprehend that the apostles thought the Father visible.

10 Believeth thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doth the works.

11 Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very works' sake.

12 Verily, verily, I say unto you, That you

9 Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father?
you shall have, if possible, a yet stronger evidence than what you have already received: for he that believes in me, that is, many of my disciples in those early ages, and each of you in particular, shall receive such an abundant communication of the Spirit, that the miraculous works which I perform, he shall perform also; yea, works in some respects greater than these shall he perform; because I go to my Father, who has thought fit to reserve the most amazing gifts of the Spirit to honour my return into glory; in consequence of which you shall be enabled to speak with all foreign tongues, to give the Spirit by the imposition of your hands, and to propagate the gospel with such amazing success, as to make more converts in one day than I have done in the whole course of my ministry.

And, in a word, you may depend upon it, that whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, under the influence of that Spirit, and subservient to the great end of your life and ministry, I will certainly do it, that so the Father may still be glorified in the Son; who, when he is ascended up to heaven, will from thence be able to hear and answer prayer, and even in his most exalted state will continue to act with that faithful regard to his Father's honour which he hath shewn in his humiliation on earth. And in this confidence I repeat it again, for the encouragement of your faith and hope, that I will be as affectionate and constant a friend to you in heaven as I have ever been upon earth; and if you shall ask anything in my name, I will not fail to do it.

As we see in the beginning of this section that care of Christ over his servants which may engage us cheerfully to trust him for providential supplies, when employed in his work, so we see in the remainder of this, and in the following discourses, the most affectionate discoveries of the very heart of our blessed Redeemer, overflowing generally requires some such limitation as is here given in the paraphrase, so the conclusion of the verse plainly implies it; for it was only by the grant of such petitions that the Father could be glorified in the Son.

*He that believes in me.] It is most evident, in fact, that though this promise be expressed in such indefinite language, it must be limited as in the paraphrase.

*Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, under the influence, &c.] As reason in flowing in every sentence with the kindest concern, not only for the safety but the comfort of his people. We see a lively image of that tenderness with which he will another day wipe away all tears from their eyes: (Rev. vii. 17.) Surely when he uttered these words he was also solicitous that our hearts might not be troubled: and therefore has provided a noble cordial, the strength of which shall continue to the remotest ages, even faith in his Father, and in him. Oh may that blessed principle be confirmed by what we have now been reading!

Let us observe with what a holy familiarity our Lord speaks of the regions of glory; not, as his servants do, like one dazzled and overwhelmed with the brightness of the idea; but as accustomed and familiarized to it by his high birth In my Father's house are many mansions; (delightful and reviving thought!) and many inhabitants in them, whom we hope through grace will be our companions there, and every one of them increase and multiply the joy.

It was not for the apostles alone that Christ went to prepare a place: he is entered into heaven as our Forerunner (Heb. vi. 20); and we, if we are believers indeed, may be said, by virtue of our union with him, to sit together in heavenly places in him. (Eph. ii. 6.) Let us continually be tending thither, in more affectionate desires, and more ardent pursuits. We know the way; we hear the truth; oh may we also feel the life! By Christ, as the true and living way, may we come to the Father; that we may have eternal life, in knowing him, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent! (John xvii. 3.) In Christ may we see him, and have our eyes and our hearts open to those beams of the Divine glory which are reflected from the face of his only-begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth! (John i. 14.) Has he been thus discovered to us, as our Father, and our God, let it suffice us. Let it diffuse a sacred and lasting pleasure over our souls, though other desirable objects may be veiled or removed; and engage us to maintain a continual fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. (1 John i. 3.)

With what a holy familiarity our Lord speaks of the regions of glory, &c. This is the remark of the pious Archbishop of Cambrai, in his incomparable Dialogues on Eloquence (which may God put it into the hearts of our preachers often and atten- tively to read); and is much illustrated by observing how the apostles, when describing the heavenly state, employ the most pompous and energetic language, and seem indeed to labour for words, and to be almost dazzled with the lustre and oppressed with the weight of the subject: (compare Rom. viii. 18, 19; 1 Cor. ii. 9; xv. 50, & secq. 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18; v. 1—9; xii. 2—4; and 1 John iii. 2.) But Christ speaks of it with a familiar ease and freedom; just as a prince, who had been educated in a splendid court, would speak with ease of many magnificent things, at the sudden view of which a peasant would be swallowed up in astonishment, and would find himself greatly embarrassed in an attempt to explain them to his equals at home.

Thus
Christ promises the Spirit as a Comforter.

To this we are invited by every declaration of his readiness to hear and answer our prayers: and though those miraculous powers of the Spirit are ceased, whereby the apostles were enabled to equal, or even to exceed, the works of their Master, yet as we have so many important errands to the throne of grace, in which the glory of God and the salvation of our souls is concerned, let us come with a holy boldness to it, in dependance on Jesus, that great High priest over the house of God, who is passed into the heavens, and amidst all the grandeur of that exalted state regards his humble followers on earth, and ever appears under the character of their Advocate and their Friend.

SECT. CLXXIV.

Christ proceeds in his discourse with his disciples, recommending a regard to his commandments as the best proof of their love to him, promising his Spirit, and declaring his readiness to meet his approaching sufferings. John XIV. 15, to the end.

John XIV. 15.

If ye love me, keep my commandments.

If ye love me, keep my commandments.

16 And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever;

17 Even the Spirit of...

a Thus you may depend on the correspondent expressions of my friendship to you.] The connection may possibly intimate that they might hope for an abundant degree of the Spirit's communication, in proportion to the prevalency of their love to Christ.

b He will give you another Comforter.] It is well known that the word παντελής may signify a comforter, an advocate, or a monitor; and it is evident the blessed Spirit sustained each of these characters:

VOL. II.

but this being a consolatory discourse, I chose to use the former, as our translators have done.—Toland says it is by no contemptible criticism that the Mahommedans (instead of παντελής) read παντελός, that is, the illustrious, which answers to Mahommed in the Arabic language; and so urge this as a prophecy of him. (Tol. Nazareu, p. 13.) Yet he would probably have thought this criticism very contemptible in any but the enemies of Christianity.

I will
is that hath his commands, and keeps them,

the blessed Spirit of truth and grace, whom the world cannot possibly receive as a Comforter, because it neither sees him nor knows him; being altogether destitute of his sanctifying influences, and refusing to admit his testimony to me: but ye know him in some measure, even now, by his powerful operations in you, and by you; for he already dwells with you in part, and shall quickly be more abundantly in you, by a much ampler communication both of his gifts and graces.

18 Encourage yourselves therefore with the pleasing expectation, and be assured that I will not leave you neglected, like a family of helpless orphans, who have no friend or guardian surviving, but I will come to you by my spiritual presence, and visit you by the most valuable tokens of my constant care. For it is but yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more, as it has done for some time past, though it knows me not; but after I have conversed with the world, I will appear again to you, and you shall see me in such a manner as to feel the blessed effects of my distinguishing regard to you; for because I live, you also shall live, by means of those Divine influences you shall derive from me, to cherish the workings of grace in your hearts, and to train you up to a growing meetness for sharing with me in eternal life. (Compare 2 Cor. iv. 10, 11.) And in that day, when I fulfil this promise to you, you shall experimentally know, by the most evident and reviving tokens, that I [am] indeed in my Father, and that you also are in me, and I in you, by a most intimate and inseparable union. But this will only be the privilege of such as evidence their love to me by an obedience to my word; for he that has my commandments discovered to him, and diligently keeps them, he it is that loveth me; but none besides have any title to this character, whatever specious pretences they may make to it: and he that thus shews that he loveth me, shall be loved by my Father, and I will also love him, and in a most condescending and endearing manner will manifest myself to him.

22 Judas was very much surprised at this; not of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.

18 I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you.

19 Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more, but ye see me: because I live, ye shall live also.

20 At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you.

21 He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me, shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and I will manifest myself to him.

22 Judas saith unto him,

I will not leave you orphans.] Elmer justly observes that the case of those who have lost the presence and patronage of some dear friend, though not in strict propriety a father, is elegantly and tenderly expressed by this word orphan. (Compare 1 Thess. ii. 17, Gr.) See Elmer. Observ. Vol. i. p. 341.
The Father and Christ will love him, and come to him.

him, (not Iscariot,) Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?

Judas Iscariot; for he, as it was said before, was gone out before our Lord began this discourse (chap. xiii. 21, sect. clxxi.) and had he been there, he was always too much on his guard to have dropped any hint of his view to Christ's temporal kingdom; but another apostle of that name, who was also called Thaddæus and Lebæus, the son of Alpheus, and the brother of James (see note' on Mark iii. 18, Vol. I. p. 282), a near relation to our Lord himself: this Judas, upon hearing Christ express himself in such a way, says to him, Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world? Dost thou not then intend to make a public appearance, which will be obvious to the eyes of all?

Jesus answered and said to him, As to that, it may be sufficient to tell you, that as I said before (ver. 21), If any man sincerely love me, he will in an humble and obedient manner keep and observe my word; and if he shall be found to do so, my Father, who at all times has a tender regard to my honour and interest, will undoubtedly love him; and we will both of us come to him, by the favourable tokens of our presence, and will make [our] constant abode with him: you are therefore to understand what I said of manifesting myself to him that loves me, not of any corporeal and sensible appearance, but of such a spiritual and intimate correspondence as the invisible Father of glory and grace maintains with his people through me. But on the contrary, he that does not really love me, does not observe and a Was always too much on his guard, &c.] It is observable, that Judas Iscariot was so finished a hypocrite, that we never find him saying one word of Christ's temporal kingdom, though probably the hope of preferment and gain in it was the chief consideration which engaged him to follow our Lord.—Let the reader indulge me while I tell him, that he owes this remark to that incomparable person, the late reverend Mr. David Sone, of Harborough; and let him join with me in lamenting the fatal modesty which engaged him with his dying breath to consign to the flames those writings which (unfinished as some of them might have appeared) would probably have been the means of spreading among thousands that spirit of wisdom, piety, and love, into which the whole soul of the author seemed to be transformed.

* A near relation to our Lord himself.

His father Alpheus seems to have been the same with Cleopas; for as Judas and James were the sons of Alpheus (Luke vi. 13, 16), so James is elsewhere said to be the son of Mary (Mat. xxvii. 56. and Mark xv. 40), who was the wife of Cleopas, and sister to the mother of our Lord, (John xiv. 25); Judas is therefore numbered with James, and Jones, and Simon, among the brethren, or near kinsmen of our Lord (Mat. xiii. 55, and Mark vi. 3); and, being so nearly related to Jesus, he might think himself peculiarly concerned to inquire into the meaning of an assertion which seemed inconsistent with the prospect of a temporal kingdom, in which, perhaps, he expected some eminent office.
and keep my words with any constancy and resolution; and therefore must expect no such spiritual and eternal benefits, whatever outward privileges he may enjoy: see to it therefore, that you diligently hearken and attend to what I say; for the word which you hear me speak is not originally or merely mine, but it is the word of the Father that sent me, who has particularly given it in charge to me, that I should thus insist upon practical and universal holiness, as one great end of my appearance.

25 And accordingly you know, that I have strongly insisted upon it as such; and these things I have spoken to you again and again, while I continued personally present with you: But when the Comforter, that I have promised you, is come; [even] the Holy Spirit, whom the Father after my departure will send in my name, to act as the great Agent in my cause, and to negotiate the affairs of my kingdom; he shall teach you all things which it is necessary for you to know, and remind you of all things which I have said to you, that you may not only recollect them in the fullest manner for your own instruction, but be able to record them for the edification of my church in succeeding ages. In the mean time, as I am now departing from you, peace I leave with you as my legacy; and as a blessing of the greatest moment and importance to you, nay peace I give unto you; such a peace as none but I can impart, a peace with God and yourselves, as well as with your fellow-creatures, which will be the spring of solid and lasting happiness: and it is not as the world often gives and wishes peace, in an empty form of ineffectual, and often, perhaps, unmeaning compliment, that I give it unto you; but as I most sincerely wish it, I will most certainly secure it to you. Let not your heart therefore be troubled at the thought of my departure, neither let it be afraid of what may befall you when I am gone; for I will help you to possess your souls in quietness and peace and will establish it upon the firmest basis.

28 You need not then to be discouraged at the separation that will now be made between us; for as you have heard how I have said to you, that I go away, so also you have been informed of my intention in it, and know that I have added, I will come [again] to you: and surely if you loved me with a wise and rational affection, it would allay my sayings: and the word which ye hear, is not mine, but the Father’s which sent me.

25 These things have I spoken unto you, being yet present with you.

26 But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.

27 Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.

28 Ye have heard how I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. If ye loved me, ye would rejoice,
They should rejoice that he was going to the Father.

rejoice, because I said I go unto the Father; for my Father is greater than I.

29 And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye might believe.

30 Hereafter I will not talk much with you: for the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me.

31 But that the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do. Arise, let us go hence.

You may more firmly believe, not only on account,

Sect. clxviv. 311

than what I would rejoice on my account, because, I said, I go to the Father; for my Father whose servant I am as Mediator, is in this respect greater than me, and consequently it must be my honour and happiness to be in a state of greater nearness to him than the present world will admit. And now I have told you this, that I have been discoursing to you concerning my own removal, my return to the Father, and the descent of the Spirit upon you, before it comes to pass; that when it does come to pass, you may more firmly believe, not only on account of the extraordinary nature of the events themselves, but also on account of their exact and evident correspondence with these predictions of mine.

It will be your wisdom the rather to observe and review these things, as I shall not hereafter have time to discourse much more with you about them; for Satan, the prince of this apostate world, is coming to encounter me, and is raising a storm against me which will quickly separate us: nevertheless, I have this comfort, that he has nothing in me, no guilt of mine to give him power over me, nor any inward corruption to take part with his temptation. But he is permitted thus to attack me, and I contentedly submit to my approaching sufferings, that the world may see and know, on the most substantial evidence, that I love the Father so well, as to refuse nothing whereby his glory may be advanced: and even as the Father has commanded me, so I do, how painful or expensive soever that obedience may be. And therefore, that we may be prepared for this hour of temptation that is coming upon us, arise let us go from hence, and retire to a place where we may more conveniently attend our devotions; and where I may be ready, when my cruel enemies shall come to apprehend me, to yield myself into their hands and to submit to what my Father has appointed for me.

Reflections

Surely, if we are not entirely strangers to the Divine life, we cannot read such discourses as these without feeling some warm emotions of love to Christ: and if indeed we feel them, let us consider how they are to be expressed. Our Lord directs us to do it in the most solid and the most acceptable manner, by a constant care to keep his commandments; and sure such commandments as his cannot be grievous to a soul that truly loves him: (1 John v. 3.) The more we live in the practice of them, the more cheerfully may we expect the abundant communications of his Spirit to animate and strengthen us.

If we are Christians indeed, let us not, in any circumstance of life, look on ourselves as helpless and abandoned orphans. Human friends may forsake us; but Christ will come to us; he will manifest himself to the eye of faith, though to the eye of sense he is invisible; and his heavenly Father will love us; and watch over us for good: yea, he will come and dwell in the obedient soul by the gracious tokens of his intimate and inseparable presence. And do we any of us experience this? We have surely reason to say that by way of admiration which the apostle said by way of inquiry, Lord, how and whence is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world! What have we done to deserve these gracious and distinguishing manifestations! Nay, how much have we done to forfeit them! even more than many, from whom they are withheld!

With unutterable joy let us review this rich legacy of our dying Lord: peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you, Lord, evermore give us this peace with God, and with our own consciences! for if thou wilt give quietness, who can make trouble? (Job xxxiv. 29.) How serenely may we then pass through the most turbulent scenes of life, when all is quiet and harmonious within? Thou hast made peace through the blood of thy cross, (Col. i. 20.) may we preserve the precious purchase and inestimable gift inviolate, till it issue in everlasting peace! In this let our hearts be encouraged; in this let them rejoice; and not in our own happiness alone, but also in that of our own glorified and exalted Redeemer. As the members of his body, we ought certainly to maintain a pleasing sympathy with our Head, and to triumph in his honour and felicity as our own. If we love Christ, we should rejoice, because he is gone to the Father. And the same consideration may in its degree comfort us when our pious friends are removed: if we love them with a rational and generous friendship, and are not too much influenced by selfish affections under that specious name, our joy for their exaltation will greatly temper the sorrow which our loss must give us.

Our
Christ represents himself as the true Vine.

Our Lord uttered these words in the near views of a grievous assault from the prince of this world, who is the prince of darkness; but there was no corruption in him to take part with the Ver. 30 enemy. Too much, alas, does he find in us to abet his temptations: let us earnestly pray that the grace of Christ may be sufficient for us: and that as his love to the Father engaged him to go through this painful conflict with the tempter, his love to us 31 may make us partakers of his victory. In his name let us set up our banners; and the powers of hell shall flee before us.

Sect. Clxxv.

Christ represents himself under the emblem of a vine, and exhorts his disciples to faith and persevering obedience. John xv. 1—11.

John xv. 1.

SOME accident occasioning a little delay before they left the guest-chamber, in which they had eaten the passover, our Lord improved the precious moments in addressing his disciples to the following purpose: I am, said he, the true and most excellent vine; by its union with whom my church is nourished; and my Father is the husbandman, who has planted this vine, and by whom it is cultivated, that it may produce delightful clusters for his service. And every branch in me by an external profession, which yet is found to be a barren branch, ly read over in a quarter of an hour, and therefore might be spoken in that small interval of time.

b The true and most excellent vine.] So the true light (John i. 9.) and the true bread, chap. vi, 32. evidently signifies. (See Raphael. Annot. ex Xen. p. 141.)—His having lately drank with his disciples of the fruit of the vine, and having afterwards declared that he would drink no more of it till he drank it new in the kingdom of God, (Mark xiv. 25. page 299.) might possibly occasion Christ's adding to it: (see Grotius, in loc.) Or perhaps they might now be standing near a window, or in some court by the side of the house, where the sight of a vine might suggest this beautiful simile. (Compare Psal. cxxxviii. 5.) That circumstance was, no doubt, common in Judea, which abounded with the finest grapes. See Gen. xlix. 11, 12. Num. xiii. 29. and Deut. viii. 8.

and bears no fruit, he taketh quite away; that is, he cuts it off in his righteous judgment, and entirely separates it from me: but every branch which brings forth fruit, he purgeth; that is, he prunes and dresses it, and on the whole, exercises such wise and kind discipline towards it (though that discipline may sometimes seem severe,) as may best answer the great end of its production, that it may bring forth yet more fruit, than which there can be nothing more desirable.

3. And thus it is with you; for now the traitor is gone out I may affirm, with the exception that I made before (compare John xiii. 10, 11, sect. clxxi.) that you are all thus purged, in such a manner as to be clean, by means of the word which I have spoken to you, whose sanctifying influence has operated on your hearts. Continue therefore in me, by the renewed exercise of humble faith and love; and I will be in you, to nourish and supply you, as from a living root, with every necessary grace; for as, in the natural world, the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, but must presently wither, unless it continue in a state of union with the vine, and be nourished by sap from thence; so neither can you be able to produce the fruits of genuine and acceptable obedience, unless you continue in me, and have the life of grace maintained within you by a vital union with me.

5. I repeat it again, as a matter of the utmost moment, That I am the vine, and ye [are] the branches, in the sense I have already explained. He therefore that abides in me by such an intimate and vital union, and in whom also I abide by the operations of my Holy Spirit in him, he, and he only, bringeth forth much fruit, to the honour of his profession, and the comfort of his own soul: but the glory of it is still to be referred to me; for separate from me you can do nothing, though you stand in the foremost rank of my followers, and have already made some considerable attainments. And if any one that calls himself my disciple does not maintain such a regard to me, as that he may be said to abide in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away: and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.

3 Now ye are clean, through the word which I have spoken unto you.

4 Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me.

5 I am the vine, ye are the branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing.

6. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is soul yet more holy, and fit for farther and more eminent service, though it should be by such painful afflictions as resemble the pruning of a vine.

c That it may bring forth more fruit:] This strongly suggests a very sublime and important thought, viz. that one of the noblest reward God can bestow on former acts of obedience, is to make the

6 If
The fruitless branch shall be burned in the fire.

If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.

Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples.

As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love.

If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love.

If any man does not abide in me, he is rejected and cast out with disdain and abhorrence, as a fruitless branch lopped off from the vine, and by consequence is presently withered; and as [men] gather up such dry sticks, and throw them into the fire, and there they are burnt, as a worthless kind of wood fit for nothing but fuel (see Ezek. xv. 2—4), so in like manner such will be the end of those unhappy creatures; they shall be gathered as fit fuel for Divine wrath, and their external relation to me will not preserve them from everlasting burnings.

But as for you my faithful servants, I assure you for your encouragement, that, if you steadfastly abide in me, and take care that in consequence of it my words abide in you, so that you maintain a suitable regard to all my instructions, promises, and commands, this blessed union will entitle you to such signal degrees of the Divine favour, that you shall ask in prayer whatsoever ye will, and, if it be upon the whole subservient to your own happiness, and to the public good; it shall be done for you. And let therefore be your care to make the suitable returns of gratitude and obedience; for in this is my Father most eminently glorified, that you, my apostles, bring forth much fruit, by exerting yourselves to the utmost for the propagation of my gospel in the world, and endeavouring to enforce your instructions by the holiness of your lives: and in this likewise you shall appear to all to be my true disciples, and to act worthy of your character and relation to me.

And it is surely with the highest reason I would engage you to make this your aim: because as the Father has loved me, so have I also loved you, with the most constant and invariable affection; continue therefore in my love, and always be solicitous so to behave, as may, on your part, maintain the friendship inviolate. And if you diligently and constantly keep my commandments, then you will assuredly continue in my love; even as I have always kept my Father's commandments, and so continue in his love; for this is the most solid evidence of it, which I give to my Father, and require from you.

These
These things I have spoken to you, not to grieve you by any intimation that I suspect the sincerity of your regards to me; but that you may be so fortified and animated against the temptations of life, that my joy and complacency in you, as my faithful friends, might still continue; and [that] your joy in me may be maintained in its full height, and may greatly increase; as it certainly will, in proportion to the advancement of your resolution and zeal in my service.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. How desirable it is that we may learn from this discourse to regard Christ, at all times, as the spiritual Head, from whom life and vigour are to be derived to all his people! Let us by the exercise of an unfeigned faith abide in him as the true vine; as being always sensible that without him we can do nothing; and that if we are in him only by an external profession, we are not only in danger of being cut off, and taken away, but shall in the end be cast into the fire. May we rather be purged and pruned, though it should be with the most painful dispensations of providence; if by this means our fructfulness may be promoted to the glory of God and to the benefit of the world! May his word operate daily upon us, to cleanse us from remaining pollutions! and if we thus desire to be clean, let us let us take heed to our way, according to the tenor of that word. Psal, cxix. 9.)

7 We see our encouragement to pray; let us take it from Christ, and not be dismayed, nor yield to unbelieving suspicions. As the Father has loved Christ, so does he also love his people. Let us preserve and cultivate this sacred friendship; and, whatever it may cost us, let us endeavour to continue in his love, and to avoid whatever would forfeit it; making it above all things our care to keep his commandments. Christ always observing those of his heavenly Father, cannot but always and invariably continue the object of his love and delight: may our conduct be such as that he may see reason to rejoice in us! and then we shall also have the surest foundation for a sublime and solid joy.

SECT. CLXXVI.

Christ renews his exhortation to mutual love, and declares the Jews inexcusable in their unbelief. John XV. 12, to the end.

OUR Lord, in order to impress the principles of mutual friendship and benevolence on the minds... love one another, as I have loved you.

13 Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

14 Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you.

15 Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you.

He did not deal with them as servants but as friends.

minds of his disciples in the most powerful manner, recommended it to them at large on this tender occasion, and proceeded in his discourse to the following purpose: This is in a peculiar manner my commandment to you, which, by all the obligations you are under to me, I charge and conjure you to observe, That ye all do most cordially and constantly love one another; even, if it be possible, with as great an ardour as that with which I have loved you; so as to be ready to sacrifice your lives for each other, as I expose and resign mine for you. (Compare John xiii. 34; 13 and 1 John iii. 16.) And surely I can give no more solid and important evidence of my affection to you; for no man has ever manifested, or can indeed imagine, greater and more disinterested love than this, that a man should be willing not only on some sudden alarm to hazard, but on the coolest deliberation to submit to lay down his life for the preservation and happiness of his friends. Now as I am about to give you this grand demonstration of my love, so I assure you, that you are, and shall be acknowledged as my friends, and shall certainly share in the blessings of my death and life, if you practically acknowledge my authority, and are so influenced by my love as to do whatsoever I command you. I do not any longer call you servants, though I have sometimes used the phrase and formerly have seen it necessary in some points to treat you with reserve; for the servant is not let into the secret of his master, and knoweth not particularly what his lord doth: but I have not only in words called you my friends (Luke xii. 4, sect. cxxi.), but on the whole have treated you as such; for all things that I have heard, and received in charge from my Father, I have, so far as was convenient, declared to you in the most condescending and endearing manner, as you very well know.

Remember

* I do not any longer call you servants: for the servant knoweth not, &c. [Mr. Tucke (in his Reasonableness of Christianity, p. 105) refers this to the caution with which our Lord had spoken of his being the Messiah; some instances of which have been already pointed out. See note on John iv. 26, Vol. I. p. 166.

b All things that I have heard from my Father I have declared to you.] Our Lord had, no doubt, the fullest view of the scheme of redemption undertaken by him; but the apostles not being able to bear many things (compare chap. xvi. 12, sect. cxxviii.), especially relating to the calling of the Gentiles and the abolition of the Mosaic law, he wisely deferred the discovery of them: so that these words must be taken with the limitation mentioned in the paraphrase, and signify that he had done it so far as was convenient.

c That
Remember that you have not first chosen me, but I by my sovereign and effectual grace have chosen you to the honourable office of my apostles and ambassadors; and have appointed and ordained you that you should go and publish what you have heard from me to all the world, and be so qualified and assisted, that you may bear abundant fruit in the most distant countries, and that the blessed effect of your fruit should continue even to the remotest generations: yea, I have also raised you to such a happy circumstance, and made you so eminently the favourites of heaven, that, as I lately told you (ver. 7), whatever you shall ask the Father in my name, he may perform it for you; and you may certainly depend upon it he will give it you.

17 But then again I would remind you, that if you would continue thus the objects of these his gracious regards, you must carefully practise your duty to each other as well as to him; for these things I command you, that ye love one another; and this you should rather do, as you will be the mark of common hatred and persecution. Yet if you find the world hate and injure you, you have no reason to be offended or surprised at this; for you know, that mild and benevolent as my conduct has always been, yet it has hated me your Chief and Lord, before it discharged its venom and malignity on you. Indeed if you were like the rest of the world, and your doctrines and practice were conformable to its customs and maxims, the world is so generally under the power of selfish prejudices, that it undoubtedly would love its own, and you might expect much better treatment from it: but because this \[\text{c} \text{ That you should go and bear fruit, \&c.} \] This was a security to them that they should be preserved from immediate dangers, and that their life should be guarded by Providence till some considerable services had been accomplished by their means.—When our Lord adds, that your fruit should continue, he may allude to the custom of keeping rich and generous wines a great many years, so that in some cases (which was especially applicable to the sweet eastern wines) they might prove a cordial to those who were unborn when the grapes were produced. In this view there is a beautiful propriety in the representation, which I hope will be particularly felt when these reviving chapters are read.

\[\text{d} \text{ It has hated me your chief.} \] The words in the original (ὅταν ἐπιλεξώμεθα ὑμᾶς ἐπιτύβιον ἀποκαταστάσεως), which we render, It hated me before it hated you, may (as Dr. Lardner well observes) be more literally rendered, It hated me your Chief; which makes the expression more lively and exactly parallel to Mat. x. 24, 25, sect. lxxv. (See Lard. Cred. part i. Vol. II. p. 693.) Thus ὃταν ἐπιλεξώμεθα ἐπιτυβιον (1 Tim. i. 15.) is well translated, of whom I am chief.

\[\text{e} \text{ If you were of the world, the world would love its own.} \] This seems to me a strong intimation, that even in nations which profess Christianity, if true religion fail, as it very possibly may, to a very low ebb, they that exert themselves remarkably for the revival of it, must, on the very principle here laid down, expect hatred

18 If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you.

19 If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.

20 Remember the word that I said unto you, The servant is not greater than his lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept my saying, they will keep yours also.

21 But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me.

22 If I had not come, and spoken unto them, they had not had sin: but this is not your character, and you are not thus of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, not only to separate from, but to oppose its vices and enormities, and even to be leaders in that holy and necessary opposition, it is no wonder that upon this account the world hateth you, though the cause in which you are engaged be indeed so honourable, and your lives so useful and beneficient.

Remember, and recollect upon this occasion, the word which I spake to you some time ago (Mat. x. 24. and Luke vi. 40,) and which I have but lately repeated (John xiii. 16,) The servant is not greater than his lord, nor the messenger greater than him that sent him: if therefore they have persecuted me, and providence has permitted them to do it, you may reasonably conclude they will also persecute you, and cannot justly complain if you have your share of sufferings; and if you have seen that they have generally kept my saying, I will give you leave to suppose they will also keep yours. But when you see, as you very quickly will, not only my doctrine rejected, but my person assaulted, abused, and murdered, it must be a sensible warning to you to prepare for the like usage; and all these things they will in fact do to you for my name's sake, because they do not know him that sent me; for their ignorance of that God to whom they boast so near a relation does indeed lie at the bottom of all their opposition to me. And a dreadful account they will have to give for it; for if I had not come and spoken thus plainly to them, they would comparatively have had hatred and opposition; and that the passages in scripture relating to persecution are not so peculiar to the first ages, or to Christians living in idolatrous countries, as some have supposed. Would to God, the malignity to be found in some of us against our brethren, did not too plainly illustrate this remark! Men will probably experience the truth of it, in proportion to the degeneracy of those around them, and to the vigour and resolution with which they bear their testimony against prevailing errors and vices. Yet it is certain, that the imprudence and bigotry of some very good men has sometimes made matters worse than they would otherwise have been, and perhaps has irritated the vices of their enemies, so as in part to have been accessory to their own damage, and the much greater mischief of those that have injured them.

[If they have kept my saying, &c.] I am surprised that such a multitude of learned commentators, and among the rest Gataker and Knatchbull, should contend that τον θεον θηρευον should here be understood of observing a person's discourse with a malignant design to carp at it. (See Wolfius, in loc.) Παρακρατήσας has indeed that sense, (Mark iii. 2. Luke vi. 7. xiv. 1. xx. 20.) But no certain argument can be drawn from hence, especially considering how constantly the phrase before us is taken in a good sense, for an obedient regard, in this very discourse, in which it often occurs. See John xiv. 15, 21, 23. xv. 10. xvii. 6.

had no sin; but now they have no excuse or pretence for their sin, but, being committed against so clear and strong a light, it stands exposed in its most odious colours: Yea, it appears rebellion against God, as well as ingratitude to me; for he that hateth and opposeth me, hateth and opposeth my Father also, whose commission I bear; and this is what they have done, after all reasonable methods have been taken for their conviction. If I had wrought no miracle at all, nay, if I had not done among them such extraordinary works as no other man ever did, not even their prophets, or Moses himself, they had not had any degree of sin, comparable to that which they are now under: but now, as they have rejected my superior miracles, which they have seen with their own eyes, at the same time that they own the evidence of those which Moses wrought, of which they have heard only by distant report, they manifest such an obstinate perverseness of temper, that I may truly say, they have both seen, and hated both me and my Father; and God himself will justly resent and punish it, as an indignity that shews their enmity to him. But [this is all permitted,] that the word which is written in their law, or in their sacred volume, concerning David (Psal. xxxv. 19,) might eminently be fulfilled in me, as many ancient prophecies foretold that it should, "Surely they have hated me without a cause."

But when the Comforter is come, whom, as I told you (chap. xiv. 26,) I will shortly send to you.
21 And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning.

you from the Father, [even] the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father, and is to reside in my church, he shall bear a convincing testimony to me, to vindicate my character from all the infamy they are maliciously attempting to throw upon it. And you also, weak as you now appear, shall by his powerful assistance bear a courageous and convincing testimony to me, because you have been with me from the beginning of my ministry, and therefore are the best qualified to give an account of my whole conduct; which the better it is known, the more it will justify my cause, and expose the wickedness of those that rise up against me.

IMPROVEMENT.

The Son of God condescends to speak under the character of a Friend: and with what humble gratitude should we attend to his words! He lays aside the majesty of a sovereign to assume this more tender relation; and surely our overflowing hearts must inquire, blessed Jesus, what shall we do to express the friendship on our side? Let us observe what he has here declared, Ye are my friends indeed, if ye do whatever I command you. Lord, we will run the way of these thy commandments, when on this noblest principle thou shalt enlarge our hearts! (Psal. cxiv. 32.)

He has loved us with an unexampled affection, which has approved itself stronger than death; and, in return, he requires us to love one another. How gracious a command! How merciful to our fellow-creatures and to ourselves, who should infallibly feel the benefit of the practice of it, both in the delight inseparable from benevolent affections, and in the circulation of kind and friendly offices, which, degenerate as human nature is, few are so abandoned as not to endeavour to repay! Who would not imagine that the whole world should feel and obey the charm? And yet, instead of this, behold, they hate Christ, and his servants for his sake, though without a cause, and against the strongest engagements. Miserable creatures! who by a necessary consequence, whatever they may fondly imagine, hate the Father also, and stand daily and hourly exposed to all the dreadful terrors of an almighty enemy.

Let us not wonder if the world hate us: nor greatly regard if it injure us. We are not of the world, nor is the servant greater than his lord: but surely the opposition which the gospel brings along with it, is nothing when compared with those blessings which it entails on all who faithfully embrace it. Were the sufferings

Christ warns his disciples of the sufferings they must expect, and labours to reconcile them to the thoughts of his remove, as what would on the whole be advantageous to them, as the occasion of sending the Spirit, which would be so great a support to them and their cause. John XVI. 1—15.

John XVI. 1.

CHRIST farther added in his discourse to his disciples, These things I have spoken to you concerning the opposition which you are to expect from the world, and the proportionable supports you will receive from the Spirit, that when the storm arises, you may not be offended and discouraged, and much less be drawn to renounce your profession, in order to avoid the danger. They shall indeed excommunicate, or cast you out of the synagogues; yea, that is not all, for the hour is shortly coming, that whosoever killeth you, shall think that he offers [an acceptable] a Whosoever killeth you.] As the lesser kinds of excommunication among the Jews were attended only with separation from synagogue worship, and from familiar converse (Luke vi. 22), or in cases of greater guilt, with confiscation of goods and forfeiture of all their substance (Ezra x. 8), the highest kind of it was a capital sentence (Lev. xxvii. 29); the execution of which, when regularly pronounced, was indeed an act of duty and obedience to God, while they had the power of life and death in their hands: but after it was wrested from them some might perhaps think it an act of very acceptable piety and zeal to attempt such executions, though at the hazard of their own lives (of which the forty conspirators against Paul do therefore so boldly avow a design, even to
They lamented his going, but it was for their advantage.

You, will think that he doeth God service.

And these things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me.

But these things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, because I was with you.

But because I have said these things unto you, sorrow hath filled your heart.

to the high priest, as if it were meritorious rather than criminal; (Acts xxviii. 14, 15.) And to such sort of facts these words of our Lord may peculiarly relate.—Permit me to digress so far as to add, that I apprehend, in other cases, after they were thus disarmed of the power of life and death, they had (as I may elsewhere prove) a dependence upon the interposition of providence to add that efficacy to their censures which their power, infringed as it was, could not give: in reference to which this highest sentence of excommunication was in the decline of their state called Anathema Maranatha, or a sentence which the Lord would remarkably come to execute; though they themselves could not carry it into effect. St. Paul therefore, with a peculiar beauty and propriety (but never, so far as I can find, fully explained), applies it to a crime not capable of conviction before any human judges; even the part of a sincere love to Christ, though under a Christian profession. Sec I Cor. xvi. 22.

b Shall think that he offers [an acceptable] service to God.] The words ἀλληλούϊα προσφέρων ἐνῷ συνεπίθεται to the world, [as Abp. Leighton observes] be rendered, offers an oblation or sacrifice to God. This intimates, as that excellent man glosses on the text (Vulg. xvii. p. 302. that "the servants of Christ, should be considered, not only as sheep for the slaughter, but as sheep for the altar too." The rage of persecuting enemies, and, beyond all comparison, the murders committed by popal cruelty in the name of the Lord, in their hecatombs of whole burnt-offerings, (if I may be allowed an expression which falls so far short of the dreadful truth,) too justly illustrate the remark. But how God will resent the murder of his children upon his altar, the day when he makes inquisition for blood will declare.

John XVI. 3.
The spirit will convince of sin, righteousness, and judgment.

But I tell you the exact truth of the case, when I say that it is on the whole advantageous to you, as well as proper for me, that I should go away, considering the agreement made between the Father and me in the counsel of peace between us; for if I do not go away, and appear in heaven under the character of the great High-Priest, the Comforter will not come to you, since the gift of the Spirit is the fruit of my purchase, and is appointed to be consequent upon my being glorified, (John vii. 39. sect. ci.) but when I go from you, I will not fail to send him to you. And when he comes, he will abundantly display the efficacy of his grace, not only in the troubles he will give you under all your troubles, but in the wonderful success with which he will enable you to carry on my cause; and will effectually convince the world, by your ministry, of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment. He will convince the world of that aggravated sin which they are guilty of, because they do not believe in me; to the truth of whose mission he will bear an unanswerable testimony by his enlightening influences and miraculous operations. He will convince them of my righteousness and innocency; because it will evidently appear that I go to my Father, and am accepted of him, when I send the Spirit from him in so glorious a manner, (compare Acts ii. 33. and Rom. i. 4.) and that my righteousness may therefore be relied on for the justification and acceptance of my people, since you see me no more appearing among you in the form of a servant, but are assured that, having finished what I was to do on earth, I am taken up to heaven, and received into glory. And he will convince them of my being invested with the power of executing judgment; because the prince of this world, the great head of the apostacy, is now as it were already judged and condemned, and shall then be triumphed over in a very remarkable manner, when his oracles are silenced and he is cast out from many persons, and countries too, which lie before possessed: (compare John xii. 31. sect. cxlviii.) And Satan being thus divested of his power, my gospel shall be propagated... propagated through the world, and a full proof at length be given of my sovereign authority, in my coming to execute judgment upon all ungodly sinners.

12 I have yet many other things to say to you, with relation to matters of considerable moment in the settlement of my church; but I wave them at present, because I know that you are not able to bear [them] now, and are not yet prepared to receive them. But when he, [even] the Spirit of truth, is come, according to the promise I have given you, he, as a faithful Guide, will lead you into all necessary truth; for he will not exceed his commission, and like a careless or unfaithful messenger, speak merely of himself; but, like a wise and good Ambassador, whatsoever he shall hear and receive in charge, [that] will he speak; and he will shew you things to come as far as may be necessary to prepare and qualify you for the great work you shall be called to: and will acquaint you with future events, the prediction of which, as delivered by you, may be a lasting testimony to the truth of my gospel. And he shall indeed glorify me in the most signal manner; for he will take of mine, or of those doctrines which relate to me, and those benefits which I procure and bestow, and will reveal and shew [it] to you, in the most clear and attractive light. And indeed all things whatsoever the Father hath are mine; and therefore, to express the whole system of evangelical truth, I said unto you, that he will take of mine, and will shew [it] to you; since whatsoever he reveals to you in the name of God may be called mine, as all truth proceeds from me, and all real goodness is my cause and interest in the world.

IMPROVEMENT.

How great is the ignorance and folly of them that persecute their brethren in the name of the Lord, and kill his dear children under the disciples, till their remaining prejudices were removed. However, the prudence of Christ, in this respect is an excellent pattern for ministers; and we had need to pray earnestly for the instructions and assistance of the Spirit of God, that we may neither forget nor abuse it.
Christ tells them, in a little time they should not see him;

under the pretence of offering him an acceptable sacrifice! Thus were the apostles treated by those that knew not the God for whom they professed all this burning zeal. Let us bless God that we are providentially sheltered from those effects of it which might otherwise bear so hard upon us; and let us diligently watch over our hearts, that no irregular affections may work there, and no uncharitable sentiments be harboured. When, like the apostles, our hearts are filled with sorrow, let us be cautious that they may not be stupified by it, so that any call of duty should pass unheard or any opportunity of religious advancement unimproved; and let us not be indolent in our inquiries into the meaning of those dispensations which we do not understand; but seriously consider whether we are not sorrowful for that which is indeed designed for our advantage, and in the issue will be matter of rejoicing to us.

We hear to what purposes the Comforter was sent. His coming was designed in a peculiar manner for the advantage of the apostles; and was of greater service to them than the continuance of Christ's presence with them in the body would have been, not only to support and comfort them under all their trials, but to acquaint them with all necessary truth, and fully to instruct them in the mysteries of godliness. And he came also for the conviction of an apostate world; for the important errand he was sent upon was to awaken men's minds, and to convince them of their own guilt, and of Christ's righteousness, and of that awful judgment which should be executed on the most inveterate of his enemies. Let us often think of the force of the Spirit's testimony to the truth of Christianity, and endeavour to understand it in all its extent. Let us bless God that the gospel, and the character of his Son, were thus vindicated; and rejoice in the views of that complete conquest, to which Satan is already adjudged. In the mean time let us earnestly pray that the influences of the Holy Spirit may be communicated to us in such a manner that Christ may be glorified in us, and we in him; and that the things of Christ may be taken, and shewn to us by that Spirit; for it can only be done by means of his influence and operations.

SECT. CLXXVIII.

Our Lord concludes his discourse with assuring his disciples that his separation from them would not be final, but that he would still act in their favour as their Guardian, and make them finally victorious, John XVI. 16. to the end.

John XVI. 16.

Our Lord continued and concluded this excellent discourse to his apostles in words to the following purpose: It is yet but a little while, and you shall not see me any more conversing with you upon earth, as I have hitherto done: and yet again, for your encouragement and comfort, I assure you that it is but a little while longer, and you shall see me again, on terms of much greater advantage, because I go to the Father; plainly intimating thereby that he would be so mindful of their interest with the Father, as ere long to bring them to an eternal abode with him.

But their thoughts were so taken up about other things, and they had still such expectations of his establishing an earthly kingdom, that, notwithstanding what he now had said was far from being obscure, they did not at first penetrate into the meaning of it: [some] of his disciples therefore said one to another, What is this that he says to us? A little while and ye shall not see me; and again, a little while and ye shall see me; and why does he add, Because I go to the Father? They said therefore among themselves, What is this little while of which he speaks? we know not what he says, and cannot apprehend what he means by it.

Now

Intimating—he would bring them to an eternal abode, &c.] As this scene is evidently much more important, so it appears to me more natural and easy than that of Mons. Le Clerc, who understands it as if Christ had said, "Though I am quickly to disappear from you, and be lodged in the grave, I shall soon come again, and make you another visit of some length, before I return to heaven by my ascension." His going to the Father was no proof of this, though it strongly proved his ability to introduce them to the heavenly world. I apprehend that the whole say which Christ's resurrection and ascension, as connected with each other, gave them, is referred to in the following discourse, which therefore is so paraphrased as to include all that is pertinent and material in the exposition above.

b What is this that he says, &c.] There are so many passages in the preceding parts of this discourse which relate to Christ's going to his Father, (chap. xiv. 2, 12, 23. xv. 26. XVI. 10.) that it is a strange instance of the dulness of the apostles that they did not understand him here. Perhaps it is recorded on purpose to shew what an alteration the Spirit afterwards made in them.—It is indeed difficult to imagine what could perplex them, unless it were that they suspected the words, A little while and ye shall not see me; and again a little while and ye shall see me, &c. might intimate that after he had gone to the Father, and made a short stay there, he would come again, and settle an earthly kingdom; and they might desire an explanation in this view. Accordingly, after having told them that, though they were sorrowful he would come and see them again after his resurrection (ver. 20, 22.) and would introduce them to a state of comfortable converse with God by prayer and a joy of which none should deprive them, (ver. 25—27, he adds, (ver. 28.) that he was quickly leaving the world, to go and reside with the Father, from whom he came; thereby gently intimating that no temporal reign was to be expected. And if we suppose him thus to have glanced obliquely at the most secret sentiments of their hearts, it will account for that confession of his omniscience which immediately follows this 28th verse (ver. 28, 29.) the reason of which would not appear merely from his discovery that they doubted about something which their countenances and whispers might shew.
Now Jesus, as the secret workings of their hearts were open to his view, knew that they were desirous to ask him for some farther explanation of what he had been saying, and yet that they were afraid of being upbraided for the slowness of their apprehensions; and therefore kindly prevented their confusion, and said to them, Do you inquire of one another concerning this which I said, A little while and ye shall not see me, and again, a little while and ye shall see me? Surely if you reflect a little, it cannot be very difficult to understand the meaning of that.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, that ye shall shortly weep and lament for a while, on account of my being taken away from you, and in the mean time, the world shall rejoice, as if it had prevailed against me; and you shall be sorrowful at the loss of my presence, but then you have this to comfort you in that interval of distress, that your sorrow shall quickly be turned into joy.

Just as a woman when she is in labour, has great anxiety and sorrow because her hour of distress and agony is come; but when she has brought forth a child, she forgets the pangs she endured, and remembereth [her] tribulation no more, for joy that a man is born into the world, and added to her family for its future honour and support.

And so it is, that you indeed have sorrow now, in expectation of the melancholy scene which is approaching; and it will very much increase your trouble to see me in a few hours more torn away from you with inhuman violence, hung as a malefactor on the cross, and buried in the grave; but when your hopes are at the lowest ebb, I will quickly see you again, after my resurrection, and your hearts shall rejoice; and afterwards, though I am absent from you in the body, yet I will fill you with such consolation by my Spirit, that no one shall, by any means whatever, deprive you of your joy, which shall sweetly mingle itself even with your heaviest afflictions.

Ye shall weep and lament, &c.] What ever immediate reference this may have to the sorrows of the apostles, immediately on the death of Christ, before his resurrection, I question not but it includes all their subsequent afflictions in the days of fasting, when the bridegroom was taken away from them, as it is elsewhere expressed in a parallel phrase, (Mat. ix. 13.) which must express much more than the abscence of the one day he lay in the grave, supposing (which is very possible) they had then but little relish to their food, See Vol. I. p. 373.

No one shall deprive you of your joy.] As this promise will be for ever accomplished to all Christ's faithful servants, so it is observable how the apostle Paul, in his more abundant afflictions, attests his experience of its truth, when he says, 23 And in that day ye shall ask me nothing: verily, verily, I say unto you, Whatever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you.

24 Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name: ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.

25 These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs: the time cometh when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall shew you plainly of the Father.

26 At that day ye shall ask in my name: and I say not unto you, that I will ask the Father for you:

27 For the Father himself loveth you, because

And in that day, when I have sent the Comforter, you shall not inquire any thing of me, nor be puzzled with much greater difficulties than those which I have now been explaining; but Divine illuminations shall be poured in upon you in the richest abundance, and with it the spirit of earnest and successful prayer; for verily, verily, I say unto you, and repeat the important assurance which I before gave you (chap. xiv. 13, 14, and xv. 16), That whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you. Hitherto ye have not been used to regard me under the character of a Mediator between God and man, and therefore have asked nothing in my name; but then, having received a fuller revelation of the doctrine of my intercession, you may come with a cheerful boldness to the throne of grace, and freely ask whatsoever shall be necessary for you; and depend upon it you shall receive such a liberal supply, that, in the midst of all your temporal discouragements, your joy in God may still be maintained in its full height.

These weighty and important things I have often spoken to you in the obscurity of parables, which have appeared dark and mysterious to you; but the hour or time is coming when I will speak no more to you in parables or dark sayings, but I will tell you what relates to the Father with all openness and plainness of speech. In that day you shall ask in my name, and shall present your supplications to the Father with an express acknowledgment of your dependance upon me for the success of your petitions; and I do not merely say to you, that I will ask the Father on your account, and plead with him for the acceptance of your prayers, though you may assure yourselves that I shall always be ready to do it; but I represent it not to you in such a view, as if every favour were obtained and as it were extorted, merely by my importunity, from one who

As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing (2 Cor. vi. 10); and mentions his share in the joy of Christians as a most important and sacred oath. (1 Cor. xv. 51.)

3 And ye shall not inquire any thing of me.] We render it ask; but I thought it proper to make some distinction between seeking, which properly signifies to make an inquiry, and asking, which is to present a request—

(The Dr. Calvin on the Trinity, p. 154.)

Yet I confess the former is sometimes used almost in the same sense with the latter (see Mat. xvi. 1); and the word seems to have the same ambiguity with demand in English. The argument some have drawn from hence against praying to Christ, on the preceding criticism, has no appearance of weight; and did signify to pray, would prove (if it proved any thing) that Paul lived, and Stephen died, in a very unwarrantable, and perhaps an idolatrous, practice.
He came from the Father, and is returning to him.

who has himself no regard for your happiness; for, on the contrary, I assure you, that the Father himself most tenderly loves you, and therefore will be ready to grant your requests, and to watch over you with paternal affection and care; because you have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God, as a messenger of his grace to men; and have accordingly relied upon me with such stedfastness, that you have ventured your all upon that belief. And you have therein acted a very prudent and happy part; for I indeed came out from the Father, and am come into the world to scatter a Divine light upon it, and to conduct men into the paths of life and peace: and now again, having dispatched my errand, I am leaving the world, and am going back to the Father; where I shall keep my stated abode, and whither I will shortly conduct you to a more glorious kingdom than you ever expected here. This is the sum of what I have been telling you, and was particularly my meaning in what I have said before (ver. 16), “Yet a little while, and ye shall see me again, because I go to the Father.”

And his disciples, struck with the correspondence of what he said to what was secretly passing in their own minds, said to him, Lord, Behold, now thou speakest very plainly to us, and usest no parable, or obscure form of expression; so that we clearly understand thy meaning, and rejoice in it. And now we know by this farther token, even thy discerning our inmost doubts on this head, that thou knowest all things, and hast no need that any one should ask thee any particular questions, to inform thee of those scruples which thou seest when first rising in the mind: on this account therefore we firmly believe that thou camest out from God.

Jesus answered them, Do you now at length believe? and do you apprehend your faith to be so firm, that nothing shall be able any more to shake it? Let me advise you not to be too confident; for I assure you, that in a very little time you will be found to act, as if you had not any faith in me: pray therefore, that God would fortify you against those trials of which I have warned you once and again. For behold, the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall return because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God.

I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.

His disciples said unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb.

Now are we sure that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee; by this we believe that thou camest forth from God.

Jesus answered them, Do ye now believe?

Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall return to your own habitations and employments, or otherwise shift for yourselves as well as you can; and to consult your own security, you shall flee away and leave me alone; but yet I am not, properly speaking, alone, for the Father is with me, and he will comfort and support me, in the absence of all human friends.

These things I have spoken thus largely to you, that whatever difficulties may arise in life, having been thus warned, and furnished with such consolations as these, you might have lasting peace and serenity of soul by the exercise of your faith in me. In the world indeed you shall have and must expect affliction; but be courageous and cheerful in your combat, for I have myself overcome the world; and, being possessed of a power infinitely superior to it, I will make you partakers in my victory over all its terrors and its snares.

IMPROVEMENT.

We are, perhaps, often regretting the absence of Christ, and Ver. 16 looking back with emulation on the happier lot of those who conversed with him on earth in the days of his flesh: but if we are true believers in an unseen Jesus, it is but a little while and we shall also see him; for he is gone to the Father, and will so successfully negotiate our affairs there, that whatever our present difficulties and sorrows are, they shall end more happily than those of a woman, who after all the pangs and throes of her labour, through the merciful interposition of Divine Providence, is made the joyful mother of a living child.

In the mean time, we have surely no reason to envy the world its joys and triumphs: alas, its season of weeping will quickly come! But our lamentations are soon to be turned into songs of praise, and our hearts to be filled with that solid, sacred and peculiar joy, which, being the gift of Christ can never be taken away.

While we are in this state of distance and darkness, let us rejoice that we have access to the throne of grace through the prevailing name of Christ. Let us come thither with holy courage and confidence, and ask that we may receive; and so our joy may be full. With what pleasure may we daily renew our visits to that throne, before which Jesus stands as an intercessor; to that throne, which is possessed by the Father, who himself loveth us, and answers with readiness and delight those petitions which are thus recommended! May our faith in Christ, and our love to him, be still on the increasing hand; and our supplications will be more and more acceptable to him, whose loving-kindness is better than 27 life! (Psal. lxiii. 3.)

Surely we shall be frequently reviewing these gracious discourses which Christ has bequeathed us as an invariable legacy. May they dwell with us in all our solitude, and comfort us in every distress! We shall have no reason to wonder if human friendship be some-

32 times false, and always precarious: the disciples of Christ were scattered in the day of his extremity, and left him alone, when they were under the highest obligations to have adhered to him with the most inviolable fidelity. May we but be able like him to say, that our Father is with us; and that delightful converse with God, which we may enjoy in our most solitary moments, will be a thousand times more than an equivalent for whatsoever we lose in 33 the creatures. In the world we must indeed have tribulation; and he that has appointed it for us, knows that it is fit we should: but since Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, who was made perfect through sufferings, has overcome the world, and disarmed it; let us seek that peace which he has established, and press on with a cheerful assurance, that the least of his followers shall share in the honours and benefits of his victory.

Sect. CLXXIX.

Christ offers, up a solemn prayer to the Father, that he himself might be glorified; and that those who were given him might be kept through his name. John XVII. 1—12.

John XVII. 1.

OUR Lord Jesus spake these words which are recorded in the preceding chapters, and then lifted up his eyes to heaven, and poured out a most affectionate and important prayer to his Father; an excellent model of his intercession in heaven, and a most comfortable and edifying representation of his temper both towards God and his people. And, that it might more effectually answer these great ends, he uttered it with an audible voice, and said, O my heavenly Father, the appointed and expected hour is come, in which I am to enter on my sufferings, and to complete the work for which I came into the world; and therefore I pray, that thou wouldest glorify me, thy Son, in those signal appearances for my honour and support in death, in my recovery from the grave, and mine ascension into heaven, which which thou hast promised to me, and which I know that thou wilt punctually fulfil, that thou hast glorified thy Son also in the whole series of his conduct, both in this world, and in that to which he is now returning, may successfully glorify thee, and accomplish the purposes of thy saving love.

2 As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.

3 And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.

4 I have glorified thee on the earth: I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do.

5 And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.

a Glorify thy Son.] All the circumstances of glory attending the sufferings of Christ; as, the appearance of the angel to him in the garden, his striking down to the ground those that came to apprehend him; his curing the ear of Malchus, his good confession before Pilate, his exerting from that unjust judge a testimony of his innocence, the dream of Pilate's wife, the conversion of the penitent robber, the astonishing constellation of virtues and graces which shone so bright in Christ's dying behaviour, the supernatural darkness, and all the other prodigies that attended his death; as well as his resurrection, and ascension, and exaltation at God's right hand, and the mission of the Holy Spirit, and the consequent success of the gospel; are all to be looked upon as an answer to this prayer.

b This is eternal life.] Christ might insert this clause (though neither a petition, plea, nor any other part of prayer) on purpose to remind his apostles of the importance of their office; as they were sent to spread that knowledge which he here calls eternal life, because the eternal happiness of men depends upon it.

c The glory which I had with thee before the world was.] To suppose, with the Sou- niants, that this refers only to that glory which God intended for him in his decrees; or, with Mr. Fleming, that it refers only, or chiefly, to his being clothed with the She-
He had faithfully instructed those that were given him.

I have manifest thy name, and revealed the glory of thy power and grace, to the men whom thou gavest me out of the world: they were originally thine, the creatures of thine hand, and the happy objects of thy sovereign choice; and in consequence of thy gracious purposes thou gavest them to me, that they might be instructed and sanctified, and formed for the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world; and such accordingly has been the influence of my doctrine on their hearts; that they have readily embraced it, and hitherto have resolutely kept and retained thy word and gospel. And, notwithstanding the mean appearance I have made to an eye of sense, their faith has owned me through this dark cloud and even now, in this my humble state, they have perceived and known that all things whatsoever which I have said and done, and all the credentials which thou hast in fact given me, and which so many overlook, are indeed of thee; and that I am truly what I profess myself to be, a Divine Messenger to the children of men, and the Saviour that was promised to come into the world. This plainly appears to be their firm persuasion; for the words which thou gavest to me, I have given to them, I have revealed already much of my gospel to them, and begun to deposit it in their hands; and in the midst of great discouragement and opposition, giving attention to the words I spake they have received [them] with faith and love, and made it manifest by their embracing and adhering to my doctrine, that they have known in truth the divinity of my mission, so as to be fully satisfied in their own minds that I came out from thee with a commission to reveal thy will (compare John xvi. 27, 30); and while I have been rejected by an ungrateful world, they have regarded me as the true Messiah, and have shewn they have believed that thou didst indeed send me on the great errand of their salvation.

6 I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world: thou wert they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word.

7 Now they have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given me, are of thee.

8 For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me, knath, seems to sink and contract the sense; far short of its genuine purpose. See Fenning's Christology, Vol. II. p. 287, and Whately in loc.

They were originally thine.] There can surely be no reason to imagine from the sacred story, that the apostles were chosen to their great office on account of any extraordinary degrees of piety and virtue previous to their being called to follow Christ. So that I can see no natural sense of these words but what I have expressed in the paraphrase. Compare John xv. 16, p. 379.

e And
And prays the Father to keep them through his own name.

Therefore pray for them, who have attended me as my apostles, and for all those who are, or shall be, brought to the same faith and the same temper, that thou wouldest support them under every trial, and wouldest regard them in a peculiar manner as the objects of thy care: I pray not thus for the unbelieving world, but for those whom thou hast graciously given me, and I am confident that my prayer for them shall not be in vain; for they are not only mine, but thine too, chosen by thy grace, and devoted to thy service. And indeed all mine interests, and my people are thine, and thine are also mine; and while thy glory is advanced by their establishment, I likewise am, and finally shall be, glorified in them: so near and intimate is our relation to each other; so sincere and active thy paternal affection to me, O my heavenly Father, and my filial duty to thee.

And now I am to continue no longer in the world; but these my faithful servants are yet in the world, and some of them are to remain a considerable time in it, exposed to various hardships and dangers: whereas I (delightful thought!) shall soon have done with this weary wilderness, and am coming to thee, who art the centre of my soul, and the supreme object of my complacency and desire. But while I am separated from these my servants, do be dear to thee and to me, vouchsafe, O holy Father, to keep these whom thou hast thyself given me, and let them be preserved through thy name; let them be kept in safety by thy mighty power, and be established in the faith by a constant regard to thee, and a sense of thy presence impressed on their hearts; that they may still continue united to us, and to each other, in cordial affection, and may be one, even as we are one. Do not, O gracious Father, forget these my friends, in whose cause I have so affectionately engaged; for thou art witness, that while I was with them in the world I kept them in thy name, and through the influences of thy grace, [yea,] I guarded them.

And I am coming to thee.] It is very plain that this clause could not be intended as an additional argument to introduce the following petition; for Christ's coming to the Father was the great security of his people: but it seems rather to be a short reflection on that dear subject, so familiar to his mind, with which he for a moment refreshed himself in the course of this humble and pathetic address. This I have endeavoured to represent in the paraphrase.
them whom thou gavest me with a most constant care, and none of them is lost, unless it be counted as a kind of exception, that the son of perdition perishes by his iniquity; that wretched creature, who in a lower sense was indeed given to me, but never, like the rest, was taken under my special care; but is left to fall into deserved ruin, that the scripture might be fulfilled, which foretold it as the dreadful consequence of his treachery. (See Psal. cix. 8, & seq. compared with Acts i. 20.)

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. 1 With pleasure let us behold our gracious Redeemer in this posture of humble adoration; lifting up his eyes to God with solemn devotion, and pouring out his pious and benevolent Spirit in those Divine breathings which are here recorded. From his example, let us learn to pray; and from his intercession, to hope. We know that the Father heareth him always (John xi. 42;) and singularly did he manifest that he heard him now, by all that bright assemblage of glories which shone around him in the concluding scenes of his abode on earth, and in those that attended his removal from it.

Unless it be the son of perdition.] I am surprised that so many very learned divines, and amongst the rest, even Bishop Burnet himself (whom I cannot mention but with the greatest honour,) should so roundly infer from these words, that the giving to Christ, in the preceding clauses, cannot imply an election to glory, since it is here intimated that Judas, who perished, was given, as well as the rest. (See Burnet on the Articles, p. 160.) The objection to a mere English reader might appear unanswerable; but those so conversant in the original might easily have observed, that if this text will prove that Judas was in the number of those given to Christ, in the same manner Luke iv. 26, 27 will prove, directly contrary to plain fact and the whole tenor of the argument, that the woman of Sarepta was a widow in Israel, and Naaman the Syrian a leper in Israel too; John iii. 13. that Christ ascended into heaven before he began his ministry; Rev. ix. 4. that the men who had not the seal of God in their foreheads, were either grass or trees; and Rev. xvi. 27, that there are some of the most abominable of mankind whose names are written in the book of life. See also Mat. v. 15. xii. 4. 1 Cor. vii. 5. 2 Cor. xii. 13. In all which places, as well as the preceding, it is plain that a son is not used strictly as an exceptive particle; and that if it has any thing like that force, it is only to intimate that what it introduces may, in a less proper sense, be reduced to the number of things mentioned before it. And this I take to be its precise sense in this text; for which reason I render it (unless it be,) though in some of the former instances it has not so much signification as that; but is used with as great a liberty, as except by Milton, when he says of Satan,

God and his Son except,
Created thing nought valued he nor shunn'd.

Thus likewise son is used, Gal. ii. 16. John v. 19. xv. 4. The words before us might indeed refer to the apostles, (compare John xviii. 8, 9, sect. clxxii.) but I do not see any necessity of confining them to Christ's care for their preservation, for the reason given above.

I am left to fall into deserved ruin.] The son of perdition signifies one who deservedly perishes: as a son of death (2 Sam. xii. 5,) children of hell (Mat. xxiii. 15,) and children of wrath (Eph. ii. 3;) signify persons justly obnoxious to death, hell, and wrath.
Christ prays that his apostles might be kept from evil. sect. clxxix. Ver. 3

it: and in all this too did the blessed Jesus manifest his zeal for the glory of the Father. May we emulate that holy temper! and when we pray even for our own consummate happiness in the heavenly world, may we consider it as ultimately centering in the honour and service of God.

Well may we be encouraged to hope for that happiness, since Christ has an universal power over all flesh, and over spirits superior to those that dwell in flesh; with which he is invested on purpose that he may accomplish the salvation of those whom the Father has given him, even of every true believer. We see the certain way to this life, even the knowledge of God in Christ: let us bless God, that we enjoy so many opportunities of obtaining it; and earnestly pray that he who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, would by his Divine rays shine forth on our benighted souls: and so animate us in his service, from the noblest principles of gratitude and love, that we may be able to say, even in our dying moments, with somewhat of the same Spirit which our Lord expressed, Father, we have glorified thee on earth, and finished the work which thou gavest us to do; and therefore, being no more in the world, we come unto thee. Then may we hope, in our humble degree, to partake of that glory to which he is returned, and to sit down with him on his victorious throne.

In the mean time, may our faith see, and our zeal confess, Christ! May we acknowledge his Divine authority, as having come out from the Father! May we be united in love to him, and to each other; and be kept by that Divine word which is the security of his people, that none of them shall be lost! Let the son of perdition, who perished even from among the apostles, teach us an humble jealousy over our own hearts, whatever external privileges we enjoy; and engage us to maintain a continual regard to him who is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy! (Jude ver. 24.)

SECT. CLXXX.

Our Lord concludes his prayer, recommending his apostles, and succeeding Christians in every future age, to the favourable regards of his Father, and praying for their union on earth and glory in heaven. John XVII. 13, to the end.

John XVII. 13. sect. clxx.

AND now come I to thee, and these things I speak in the world, O my heavenly Father, I come unto thee with unutterable.

John XVII. 13. sect. clxx.

OUR Lord proceeded in that excellent address to God, which he had begun in the former section, in such words as these: And now, O my heavenly Father, I come unto thee with unutterable.
And that they might be sanctified through the truth.

14 I have given them thy word; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world:

15 I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil:

16 They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world.

17 Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth:

a Sanctify them through thy truth.] I see no reason to conclude, with Mr. Made, that or τι αληθινον must be put for or τι αληθινον, that is, for the service of the gospel. That was indeed the remote end which our Lord had in view; but the more immediate was that their own souls might be transformed and purified by it.—To sanctify signifies in general to set apart to any appropriate use; and is used with peculiar propriety with reference to a sacrifice: which seems to be the sense in which our Lord applies it to himself in ver. 19. Compare Exod. xiii. 2, xxix. 1, and Lev. xxii. 2.

b That
He prays that all believers might be one in them.

18 As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world. And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth.

19 And for their sakes I sanctify myself, or set myself apart as an offering holy to thee; that they also, taught by my example, and animated by my dying love, may be truly sanctified through the truth, and completely fitted for their important office.

And in presenting these petitions for them, I am not chiefly influenced by the personal attachment of private friendship, but I consider them under their public character; nor do I pray for these my apostles alone, or offer myself merely for them; but for them also who shall hereafter believe on me through their word, whether it be preached or written; even for those who are yet unborn, and on whom the ends of the world shall come: That, being animated by the same Spirit, and inspired with the same love, they all may be truly and intimately one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may in friendship and happiness be one in us, united to us and to each other, and deriving from us the richest supplies of Divine consolation; that so the world, seeing their benevolence, and charity, and holy joy, may believe that thou hast sent me, and that a religion productive of such amiable fruits is indeed of Divine original.

And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them: that they may be one, even as we are one:

18 John XVII.17

20 Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word:

21 That they all may be one, as thou Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.

22 And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them: that they may be one, even as we are one:

b That the world may believe that thou hast sent me.] This plainly intimates that dissensions among Christians would not only be uncomfortable to themselves, but would be a means of bringing the truth and excellence of the Christian religion into question: and he must be a stranger to what hath passed, and is daily passing, in the world, who does not see what fatal advantage they have given to infidels to misrepresent it as a calamity, rather than to regard it as a blessing to mankind. May we be so wise as to take the warning, before we are quite destroyed one of another! (Gal. v. 15.)

c The glory which thou gavest me I have given.
one, and, in consequence of such a blessed union, may dwell together with us, and with each other, in eternal felicity: Thus therefore may it ever be, I dwelling in them, and thou in me; that they who now enjoy the first beginnings of this happy state, may at length be made perfectly one, and be united in the most cordial love, without any jarring affection, or the least mixture of sorrow and complaint; that so the clearest demonstration may be given of the efficacy of thy grace, and that the world by this means may know that thou hast sent me, while they perceive them under my forming care to become visibly and justly the favourites of heaven; and it may thus be manifest to all that thou hast loved them, as thou hast loved me, and hast extended this mercy to them for my sake.

24 But no improvements, either in holiness or comfort, in this world, can completely answer the purposes of my love, and the promises of my grace to them; and therefore, O my Father, permit me to say, that I will, that is, I inordinately ask it, and, in consequence of the mutual transactions between us, I am bold to claim it as matter of right, that they also whom thou hast graciously given me, even all thy chosen and sanctified people, may at length be with me where I am, in that heavenly world to which I am now removing; that they may there behold and contemplate, with everlasting delightful admiration, my glory which thou hast by thy sure appointment given me, and art just ready to bestow, for thou hast loved me before the foundation of the world, and didst then decree for me that mediatorial kingdom with which thou art now about to invest me.

25 And herein thou wilt not only be merciful, but faithful and just too, as it is congruous to those essential perfections of thy nature, O most righteous Father, thus to distinguish me and my followers with a peculiar glory; for though the world has not known or acknowledged thee, yet I have [given them, &c.] As it was plainly in his Father's name, and by the authority of his commission, that Christ had given them this promise, which with a lively faith they had affectionately embraced: so this was one of the strongest arguments that could be urged for the complete accomplishment of it.

25 I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one, and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

24 Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me: for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.

25 O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee; but I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me.

[d My glory which thou hast given me.] This may express the lustre and beauty of Christ's personal appearance, the adoration paid him by the inhabitants of the upper world, and the administration of the affairs of that providential kingdom, which it is his high office to preside over.

[e Though the world has not known thee.] That Reflections on Christ’s prayer for his people.

I have known thee, and have accordingly directed the whole of my ministrations to thy glory! and these my servants too have known that thou hast sent me, and will courageously assert it, even at the expense of their very lives. And I have declared thy name to them, and will, as I have opportunity, farther go on to declare [it], both by my word, and by my spirit; that their graces and services may be more eminent; that even the love with which thou hast loved me may be dwelling in them; and that I also may take up my constant residence in them by my spiritual presence, when my bodily presence is removed, as it will quickly be.

IMPROVEMENT.

We have indeed perpetual reason of thankfulness, that our gracious Redeemer spake these words in the world, and recalled them thus exactly to the memory of his beloved disciple so many years after, that we in the most distant ages of his church might, by reviewing them, have his joy fulfilled in us. Let us with pleasure recollect that those petitions which Christ offered for his apostles were expressly declared not to be intended for them alone; but so far as circumstances should agree, for all that should believe on him through their word, and therefore for us, if we are real, and not merely nominal believers. For us doth he still pray, not that God would immediately take us out of the world, though for his sake we may be continually hated and injured in it; but that he would keep us from the evil to which we are here exposed. For our sakes did he also sanctify himself as a propitiation for our sins, that we also might be sanctified through the truth; for he gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good words. (Tit. ii. 14.)

May these wise and gracious purposes of his love be fulfilled in us! May we be one with each other, and with him! May that piety and charity appear in the whole series of our temper and behaviour, which may evidently shew the force of our religion, and reflect a conspicuous honour upon the great Founder of it! And may all concur to train us up for that complete felicity above, in which all the purposes of his love centre! It is the declared will of Christ, and let us never forget it, that his people should be with

That is here signifies Though, the connection plainly demonstrates; and Elsner produces many instances of it: (Observ. Vol. I. 284.) To which the following instances from the sacred writers may be added, among many others, Luke xviii. 7. John xiv. 20. Acts vii. 5. and Heb. iii. 9.
As Christ is going with his disciples to the garden, with him where he is, that they may behold his glory which the Father has given him. And there is apparent congruity, as well as mercy in the appointment: that where he is, there also should his servants and members be. The blessed angels do undoubtedly behold the glory of Christ with perpetual congratulation and delight: but how much more reason shall we have to rejoice and triumph in it when we consider it as the glory of one in our own nature, the glory of our Redeemer and our Friend, and the pledge and security of our own everlasting happiness! Let us often be lifting up the eyes of our faith towards it, and let us breathe after heaven in this view; in the mean time, with all due zeal, and love, and duty, acknowledging the Father and the Son, that the joys of heaven may be anticipated in our souls, while the love of God is shed abroad there by his Spirit, which is given unto us; even something of that love wherewith he has loved Jesus our incarnate Head.

SECT. CLXXXI.

Jesus retires from the guest-chamber to the garden of Gethsemane, and in his way thither reviews the caution which he had given to Peter and the rest of the apostles. Mat. XXVI. 31—35. Mark XIV. 27—31. Luke XXII. 39. John XVIII. 1.

John XVIII. 1.

AND when Jesus had spoken these words that are mentioned above, and had concluded his discourse with this excellent prayer to his heavenly Father, he came out from the guest-chamber, where he had celebrated the passover, and, according to his usual custom every night, went forth with his disciples out of the city; and crossing over the brook Kedron which lay on the east side of Jerusalem, he came to the foot of the mount of Olives, where there was a garden belonging to one of his friends, into which he had often been used to retire; and though he knew his enemies would come this very night to seize him there, yet he entered into it, and his disciples also followed him.

Then, * A Garden, into which he entered.] Christ probably retired into such a private place, not only for the advantage of secret devotion, which perhaps he might not so well have enjoyed in the city at so public a time, but also that the people might not be alarmed at his being apprehended, nor, in the first sallies of their zeal and rage, attempt to rescue him in a tumultuous manner.—Kedron was, as its name signifies, a dark shady vale between Jerusalem and the mount of Olives, through which a little brook ran which took its name from the place. (Compare 2 Sam. xv. 23.)

b He
He tells them they would all be offended and leave him.

MAT. XXVI. 31.—Then saith Jesus unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night: for it is written, I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad. [Mark xiv. 27.]

32 But after [that] I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee. [Mark xiv. 28.]

33 [But] Peter answered and said unto him, Though all men shall be offended because of thee, [yet] will I never be offended. [Mark xiv. 29.]

b He named the particular place where he would meet them. An appointment to meet in so large a region as Galilee would without this have been of very little use; and Mat. xxviii. 16. (sect. ccc.) expressly declares such an appointment. We do not know the exact place, but we there learn from Matthew it was a certain mountain: probably it might be near the sea of Tiberias; not only because we find Christ on the borders of that sea after his resurrection (John xxii. 1. sect. cc.) but also because, as he had resided there longer than any where else, he had, no doubt, the greatest number of his disciples thenceabouts; and it lay pretty near the centre of his chief circuits, and therefore must be most convenient, especially for those beyond Jordan, where many had of late believed in him. See John x. 40—42. sect. cxxviii.

Jesus
Jesus said to him, Peter, this confidence does not at all become thee, especially after the warning I gave thee at supper; but I repeat it again, and verily I say unto thee, That to-day, yea, [even] this very night which is now begun, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt repeatedly deny me in the most shameful manner; for after thou hast heard it once, thou shalt not be admonished; but before it crow a second time, thou shalt repeat the fault; nay thou shalt do it thrice and every time with new aggravations.

But Peter upon this, instead of being awakened to a humble sense of his own weakness, spake the more eagerly [and,] with a mixture of grief and indignation at the thought, said to him, Lord, no danger whatsoever can induce me to be guilty of such baseness; for such is the sincerity and strength of my affection to thee, that though I should die with thee on the place, yet I will not deny thee in any manner or degree, but would a thousand times rather fall by thy side in a brave and resolute defence, than so much as seem to neglect thee, or in any respect fail of the strictest and most affectionate fidelity. Likewise also said all the disciples, with equal sincerity of present intention, though neither he nor they had courage enough to abide by that resolution. Jesus therefore insisted no farther on the matter, but left them to be taught by the event.

IMPROVEMENT.

So feeble is the heart of man, and yet so ready to trust to its own strength! So gracious is the Lord Jesus Christ, that great Shepherd...
Shepherd and Bishop of souls, who gave himself to be smitten for his flock when they had forsaken him; and then returning, sought them out again, and fed them in richer pastures than before!

How reasonable is it that our hearts should be fixed in the most inflexible resolution for his service! How fit that we should every one of us say, with the utmost determination of soul, Lord, though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee! For how could death wear a more graceful, or a more pleasing form, then when it met us close by our Saviour's side, and came as the seal of our fidelity to him.

Surely this is the language of many of our hearts before him, especially when warmed and animated by a sense of his dying love to us. Yet let us not be high-minded; for Peter, after this declaration, denied his Master; and the same night in which they had protested they would never leave him, all the disciples forsook him and fled. (Mat. xxvi. 56.)

Nor, on the other hand, let the view of that frailty discourage, though it ought to caution us; for the time came when each of them behaved as they here spoke; and they who in his very presence acted so weak a part, through the influences of his strengthening spirit, resisted unto blood, and loved not their lives unto the death, for the testimony of Jesus. (Rev. xii. 11.)

SECT. CLXXXII.

Jesus enters the garden of Gethsemane, and falls into his agony there; during which his disciples fell asleep, for which he gently reproves them, and warns them of the enemies' approach. Mat. XXVI. 36—46. Mark XIV. 32. 42. Luke XXII. 40—46.

Mat. XXVI. 28.

Then cometh Jesus with them unto a place called Gethsemane; and [Luke, when he was at the place, he] saith unto [his] disciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder. [Mark xiv. 32. Luke xxii. 40—41.]

Mat. XXVI. 36.

Then after this discourse with his disciples, Jesus comes with them to the place we mentioned above, which was called Gethsemane, as being a very pleasant and fertile garden; and when he was arrived just at the entrance into the place whither he was used to retire, he says to eight of his disciples, Sit ye down here a while, and observe what passes abroad, while I go and pray in yonder retirement.

And

a Called Gethsemane, as being a very pleasant and fertile garden. It is well known that Gethsemane signifies the valley of Fatness. The garden probably had its name from its soil and situation, and lay in some little valley between two of those many hills, the range of which constitutes the mount of Olives; and it is with some peculiar reference to this situation that some have rendered it fertile oil, or a vat of oil.

b He
Jesus is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.

And, as this was a very extraordinary passage of his life, he took along with him Peter, and the two sons of Zebedee, James and John, who had been witnesses of his transfiguration, and were now chosen by him to be witnesses of his agony. And as he went on with them towards a more retired part of the garden, he began to be in a very great and visible dejection, amazement and anguish of mind, on account of some painful and dreadful sensations which were then impressed upon his soul by the immediate hand of God.

Then, turning to his three disciples, he says to them, My friends, you never saw me in so great distress as now; for my soul is surrounded on all sides with an extremity of anguish and sorrow, which tortures me almost unto death; and I know that the infirmity of human nature must quickly sink under it, without some extraordinary relief from God; to him therefore I will apply with the greatest earnestness: and do you in the mean time continue here, and watch with me. Considering how liable we are to be surprised; and let me remind you also to pray for yourselves, that you may not enter into that dangerous temptation of which I have just been giving

Works, p. 38.—Dr. Whitby will not allow that these agonies arose from the immediate hand of God upon him; which he thinks not to be the case, even of the damned in hell. But it seems impossible to prove that it is not. He rather thinks it might arise from a deep apprehension of the malignity of sin, and the misery brought upon the world by it. But, considering how much the mind of Christ was wounded and broken with what he now endured, so as to give some greater external signs of distress than in any other circumstance of his sufferings, there is reason to conclude there was something extraordinary in the degree of the impression: and it surely comes much to the same, whether we say that God, by his own immediate agency, impressed some uncommon horrors on his mind, or that the strength of his spirits, and perhaps the tone of his nerves, were so impaired, that the view he had of these things should affect him to a degree of exquisite and uncommon sensibility.

c Watch with me.] Had they done this carefully they would soon have found a rich equivalent for their watchful care, in the eminent improvement of their graces by this wonderful and edifying sight.
And prays, that if possible, the cup might pass from him.

36 And he said, Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; [O my Father, if it be possible] take away this cup, [and let it pass] from me; nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt. \[Mat. xxvi. 36.\] giving you notice, or may be kept from falling by it. See Mat. xxvi. 31, sect. clxxxii.

And going on a little way from thence into a more retired part of the garden, when he was now withdrawn about a stone's throw from the place where he left them, he first humbly knelt down, and then, as the ardour of his devotion increased, he prostrated himself on his face to the ground, and prayed, That if it were possible, that dreadful season of sorrow, with which he was then almost overwhelmed, might be shortened, and pass from him. And he said, Abba, Fa—36 ther; I know that all things proper to be done are possible to thee; and, O my Father, if it be so far possible, as to consist with what thy wisdom has appointed for the advancement of thy glory, and the salvation of thy people, I earnestly beseech thee, that thou immediately wouldst take away this cup of bitterness and terror; yeal let it now pass from me, and let comfort and peace return to my soul; nevertheless, if thou seest it necessary to continue it, or to add yet more grievous ingredients to it, I am here ready to receive it in submission to thy will, and resolutely say upon the whole, Not as I will, but as thou wilt; for though nature cannot but shrink back from these sufferings, it is the determinate purpose of my soul to bear whatsoever thine infinite wisdom shall see fit to appoint.

And upon this, rising up from the ground on which he had lain prostrate, he comes again to the three disciples, and, notwithstanding the distress that he was in, and the command that he had given to them to watch, he finds them all asleep; and he particularly says to Peter (who had but lately made such solemn protestations of his peculiar zeal and fidelity,) What, Simon, dost thou sleep at such a time as this? and after thou hadst just declared thy resolution to die with me, couldst thou so soon forget thy promise to stand by me, and not so much as watch or keep awake but

d Take away this cup.] Nothing is more common than to express a portion of comfort or distress by a cup, alluding to the custom of the father of a family, or master of a feast, to send to his children or guests a cup of such liquor as he designed for them. See note d, on Mat. xx. 22, p. 154; and with the texts which are referred to at the end of that note compare Psal. xvi, 5; xxiii, 5; lxxv. 8; Jer. vii. 7; xlii. 12; Lam. iv. 21; Ezek. xxiii, 32, 33; Hab. ii. 16; and Rev. xiv. 10; xvi. 19. In some of which texts there may, perhaps, be a reference to the way of executing some criminals by sending them a cup of poison; which is well known to have been an eastern, though not (so far as I can learn) a Jewish custom.

but for one hour, when I was in such an agony? And you that were so ready to join with him in the same profession, could neither of you be mindful of me; and in this time of my extreme distress were ye all so unable to perform your resolution as not to watch one single hour with me? I must again exhort you to watch and pray with the greatest earnestness, that ye may not enter into and fall by that dangerous temptation which is now approaching: the spirit indeed is forward, and ready to express the dutiful regard that you have for me, and I know your resolutions of adhering to me are very sincere; but yet, as your own present experience may convince you, the flesh is weak; and as you have been so far prevailed upon by its infirmities, to fall asleep at this very unseasonable time, so if you are not more upon your guard, and more importunate in seeking for assistance from above, it will soon gain a much greater victory over you.

And when he had thus gently admonished them, he went away again the second time, to a little distance from them, and prayed as he had done before, speaking much the same words, or expressing himself to the like effect, with the same ardour and submission, saying, O my Father, if it be necessary, in pursuance of the great end for which I came into the world, that I should endure these grievous sufferings, and this cup cannot pass from me without my drinking it, and wringing out, as it were, the very dregs of it, I will still humbly acquiesce, and say, Thy will be done, how painful soever it may be to flesh and blood.

And returning back to his three disciples, he found them asleep again: for the fatigue and trouble they had lately undergone had exhaust-

Watch and pray, &c.] How poorly is this exhortation answered by those vigils and nocturnal offices of the Romish church, which are said to have had their original from hence! Rhemish Text, p. 79.—I think it more proper, on a review, to render these words as yeareale in the preceding verse, with Dr. Hammond, Were ye so unable, &c. than to retain our version of shivo, which seems a less common and less forcible sense.

[The spirit indeed is forward and ready, but the flesh is weak.] So gentle, a rebuke, and so kind an apology (as Archbishop Tillotson very justly and beautifully observes), were the more remarkable, as our Lord's mind was now discomposed with sorrow, so that he must have the deeper and tenderer sense of the unkindness of his friends. (See Tillots. Works, Vol. II. p. 435.)—How apt are we to think affliction an excuse for perverseness! But how unlike are we to Christ in that thought, and how unkind to ourselves, as well as to our friends, to whom, in such circumstances, with our best temper, we must be more trouble-eyes were heavy; neither wisht they what to answer him. [Mat. xxxvi. 43.]

MAT. XXVI. 44. — And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, saying the same words; Luke xxii. 42. — Saying, Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done, 43 And there appeared an angel unto him, from heaven, strengthening him.

MAT. XXVI. 44. — And, having roused them for the present from their sleep, he left them; and went away again, and prayed the third time, speaking much the same words as before, or offering petitions to the same effect: Saying, Father, if thou pleasest to take away this cup from me, and to excuse me from the continuance of this bitter anguish and distress, it is what would greatly rejoice me, and with due submission I would humbly ask it; nevertheless, as I said before, not my will, but thine be done. And, in this last address, his combat was so violent and severe, that he was almost overwhelmed; and therefore, for his assistance against the powers of darkness, which united their force against him in the most terrible manner, there appeared to him an angel from heaven, standing near him in a visible form, strengthening him by that sensible token of the Father's protection and favour, and suggesting such holy consolations as were most proper to animate his soul in such a struggle. Yet, with all these assurances that he was still the charge of heaven, and quickly should be made victorious combat in which he was now actually engaged. (See Limborch's Theol. lib. iii. cap. 13, § 17.) This throws great light on Heb. v. 7, He was heard in that he feared. Since the former editions I have had the pleasure to find this interpretation beautifully illustrated and judiciously confirmed by the learned Dr. Thomas Jackson, in his Works, Vol. II. p. 813, 817, 947.

44 And being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly; and his sweat ed their spirits, and their eyes were quite weighed down with weariness and sorrow; and he admonished them again as before; and they were so thoroughly confounded, that they knew not what to answer him; and yet immediately after they were so weak and senseless as to relapse into the same fault again.

Speaking much the same words.] It is plain, by comparing ver. 39 and 42, that the words were not entirely the same; and it is certain that x\gamma\omega\psilon\ often signifies matter; so that no more appears to be intended than that he prayed to the same purpose as before. If thou pleasest to take away this cup from me.] The observant reader will easily perceive by the paraphrase, that I do not suppose our Lord here prayed to be excused entirely from sufferings and death. Such a petition appears to me so inconsistent with that steady constancy he always shewed, and with that lively turn (John xii. 27, 28, p. 170) in which he seems to disown such a prayer, that I think even Hooker's solution, though the best I have met with, is not satisfactory. Hooker's Eccles. Politi, lib. v. § 48.) It appears to me much safer to expound it, as Sir Matthew Hale does (in his Contemplations, Vol. I. p. 59), as relating to the terror and severity of the

ous over all; his terror and distress continued; and, being in an unspeakable agony, he prayed yet more intensely than before, insomuch that, though he was now in the open air, and in the cool of the night, his sweat ran off with uncommon violence; yea, so extraordinary was the commotion of animal nature, that blood was also forced in an amazing manner through the pores together with the sweat; which was as it were great drops of blood falling down from his face, and dropping in clots on the ground, as he bowed himself to the earth.

45 And rising up from prayer, after this dreadful conflict, he came back to his disciples the third time, and, notwithstanding the repeated admonitions he had given them, he again found them sleeping; for their senses were quite stupefied, and their spirits exhausted with sorrow. And he said to them, Why do you still go on to sleep at such a season as this? This drowsy disposition makes it necessary to renew my exhortation, and to call upon you yet once more to arise and pray that you may not enter into a circumstance of very dangerous temptation. But as this all did not sufficiently rouse them, and he knew those that came to apprehend him were just now entering the garden, he altered his voice, and said to them in an ironical manner, You may now sleep on if you can, and take your rest as long as you please. I have been calling you to watch; but it is now enough; for this season of watching is over, and I have no further need to press you to it: you will now be roused by another kind of alarm than what my words have given; for behold, the long expected hour is at length come, and the Son of man is even now betrayed into darkness: the former says he was now surrounded with a mighty host of devils, who exercised all their force and malice to persecute and distract his innocent soul; and the latter supposes that Satan hoped, by overpowering him here, to have prevented the accomplishment of the prophecies relating to the manner and circumstances of his death. (See Scott's Christian Life, Vol. III. p. 149, and Fleming's Christology, Vol. II. p. 150.) But however this be, I can hardly think, as Dr. Scott suggests, that there was some supernatural agency of those evil spirits in the drowsiness of the disciples, since the sacred historian is silent on this head, and refers it to another cause.

45 And when he rose up from prayer, and was come to his disciples, [Mark, the third time,] he found them sleeping for sorrow, [Mat. xxvi. 45—Mark xiv. 41.]

46 And said unto them, Why sleep ye? rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

Mat. xxvi. 45. — And he saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest; [it is enough;] behold, the hour is [come], and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. [Mark xiv. 51.]
Rise, let us be going; behold, he is at hand that doth betray me. [Mark xiv, 42.]

into the hands of the most inhuman sinners; Arise, therefore, and let us go along with them whithersoever they shall lead us; for behold, he that betrayeth me is just at hand. Accordingly Judas and his retinue immediately appeared, and seized him in the manner which will be next related.

IMPROVEMENT.

On the most transient survey of this amazing story we cannot but fall into deep admiration. What a sight is here! Let our souls turn aside to behold it with a becoming temper: and surely we must wonder how the disciples could sleep in the midst of a scene which might almost have awakened rocks and trees to compassion.

Behold the Prince of life, God’s incarnate and only-begotten Son, drinking of the brook in the way (Psal. ex. 7); and not only tasting, but drawing in full draughts of that bitter cup which his heavenly Father put into his hands on this awful occasion. Let us behold him kneeling, and even prostrate on the ground, and there pouring out his strong cries and tears to him that was able to save him from death. (Heb. v. 7.) Let us view him in this bloody agony, and say, If these things be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? (Luke xxiii. 31.) If even Christ himself was so depressed with sorrow and amazement, and the distress and anguish he endured were such, that in his agony the sweat ran from him like great drops of blood, when our iniquities were laid upon him, and it pleased the Father to bruise him, and to put him to grief (Isa. liii. 6, 10); how must the sinner then be filled with horror, and with what dreadful agonies of anguish and despair will he be overwhelmed, when he shall bear the burthen of his own iniquities, and God shall pour out all his wrath upon him? Behold, how fearful a thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God! (Heb. x. 31.)

Here was no human enemy near our blessed Redeemer; yet such invisible terrors set themselves in array against him, that his very soul was poured out like water; nor was there any circumstance of his sufferings in which he discovered a greater commotion of spirit. Nevertheless, his pure and holy soul bare all this without any irregular perturbation. In all this he sinned not by a murmuring word, or an impatient thought: he shone the brighter for the furnace of affliction, and gave us at once the most wonderful and the most amiable pattern of resignation to the Divine disposal, when he said, Father not as I will, but as thou wilt.—May this be our language under every trial! Lord, we could wish it was; and we would maintain a holy watchfulness over our own souls, that it may be so! But in this respect, as well as in every other, we find that even when the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak. How happy is it for us that the blessed Jesus knows our frame, and has learnt, by what he himself suffered in our frail nature, to make the most compassionate allowance for its various infirmities! Let us learn to imitate this his gentle and gracious conduct, even in an hour of so much distress. Let us bear with and let us pity each other, not aggravating every neglect of our friends into a crime; but rather speaking of their faults in the mildest terms, and making the most candid excuses for what we cannot defend. Let us exercise such a temper, even in the most gloomy and dejected moments of life; which surely may well be expected of us, who ourselves need so much compassion and indulgence almost from every one with whom we converse; and, which is infinitely more, who owe our all to the forbearance of that God, of whose mercy it is that we are not utterly consumed.

Jesus is betrayed by Judas, and seized by the guard, to whom, after glorious displays of his power, he voluntarily surrenders himself, and is then forsaken by all his disciples. Mat. XXVI. 47—56. Mark XIV. 43—52. Luke XXII. 47—53. John XVIII. 2—12.

NOW when our Lord was thus retired to the garden, Judas also that betrayed him knew the place; for Jesus often resorted thither in company with his disciples; and had particularly done it again and again since his coming up to spend this passover at Jerusalem. (Compare Luke xxi. 37. p. 268.) Judas therefore taking with him a band [of soldiers], or a Roman cohort, with their captain (see ver. 12), and some Jewish 3 Jesus often resorted thither with his disciples.] It was probably a garden which belonged to one of Christ's friends, and to which he had a liberty of retiring whenever he pleased. And here accordingly he often used to spend some considerable time in prayer and pious converse, in the evenings or nights after his indefatigable labours in the city and temple by day. It is indeed amazing how flesh and blood could go through such incessant fatigues; but it is very probable Christ might exert some miraculous power over his own animal nature to strengthen it for such difficult services, and to preserve it in health and vigour; otherwise the copious dews which fall by night in those parts must have been very dangerous (as I have elsewhere hinted, sect. lxxxvi. note c), especially when the body was heated by preaching in the day, and often by travelling several miles on foot.

the chief priests and Pharisees, coming thither with lanterns, and torches, and weapons.

And immediately while he yet spake, [Jo, Judas, one of the twelve, came,] and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders [of the people.] [Mat. xxvi. 47. Luke xxii. 47.]

And he that betrayed him, [Luke, went before them, and] had given them a token saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he; take him, [hold him fast,] and lead him away safely. [Mat. xxvi. 48. Luke xxii. 47.]

b Had given them a signal.] As those that came to apprehend him were strangers to Jesus, and it was now night, and there were twelve persons together, probably dressed much alike, such a signal might be thought more necessary.

c He whom I shall kiss is the person.] It is indeed probable, as Dr. Guyse and others observe, that our Lord, in great consternation, had used (according to the Jewish custom) to permit his disciples thus to salute him, when they returned to him after having been any time absent.

d Lead him away safely; for he has sometimes made strange escapes from those that have attempted to take him, and if he get away from you after this signal it will be your fault, and not mine. And
And accordingly, being come into the garden, he drew near to Jesus to kiss him, as a signal to the company to seize him; [and] going directly to him, with an air of the greatest respect, as if he had been impatient of his absence during those few hours which had passed since he saw him last, and was quite transported with joy to meet him again, he said, with the fairest appearances of duty and friendship, \textit{Hail to thee, Rabbi, Rabbi! May the greatest pleasure and happiness continually attend thee!} And upon this he kissed him. \textit{But Jesus, well understanding the perfidious purposes concealed under this fond address, answered with great mildness, yet with becoming spirit, and said to him, Friend, wherefore art thou come? and whence is all this ceremony and transport? Think of it, Judas! Is this the friendship thou hast so often boasted? Alas, \textit{dost thou betray} him whom thou couldst not but know to be the Son of man with such a treacherous kiss? And dost thou think that he can be imposed upon by this poor artifice?, or that God, who has promised him so glorious and triumphant a kingdom, will not punish such baseness and cruelty to him?\textit{ Then Jesus, though he fully understood what was to follow this perfidious salutation, as knowing all the dreadful things that were coming upon him,} yet did not attempt to escape, or to withdraw himself out of the power of his enemies: nevertheless, he determined to shew them that he could easily have done it; and therefore as they now, upon the signal that was given them, quainted also with all the particular circumstances of ignominy and horror that should attend his sufferings: which accordingly he largely foretold (see Mat. xx. 18, 19, and the parallel places, p. 132), though many of these circumstances were as contingent as can well be imagined.—It is impossible to enter aright into the heroic behaviour of our Lord Jesus Christ, without carrying this circumstance along with us. The critics are in raptures at the gallantry of Achilles in going to the \textit{Trojan war}, when he knew (according to Homer) that he should fall there: but he must have a very low way of thinking who does not see infinitely more fortitude in our Lord’s conduct on this great occasion, when this circumstance, so judiciously though so modestly suggested by St. John, is duly attended to.

\textit{John xviii. 4.} Jesus therefore knowing all things that should come upon him, went forth.
Jesus comes forward, and his enemies fall to the ground.

5 They answered, him, Jesus of Nazareth, Jesus saith unto them, I am \( \text{he} \). And Judas also which betrayed him, stood with them.

6 As soon then as he had said unto them, I am \( \text{he} \), they went backward and fell to the ground.

7 Then asked he them again, Whom seek ye? And they said, Jesus of Nazareth.

8 Jesus answered, I have told you that I am \( \text{he} \). If therefore ye seek me, let these go their way.

They drew back, and fell to the ground.\[1\]

As there were scribes and priests among them, they must have read of the destruction of those companies which came to seizure the prophet Elijah, (2 Kings i, 10, 12.) a fact which bore so great a resemblance to this, that it is an amazing instance of the most obdurate wickedness, that they should venture to renew the assault on Christ, after so sensible an experience both of his power and mercy. Nothing seems more probable, than that these wretches might endeavour to persuade themselves, and their attendants, that this strange impulse was effected by some demon in confederacy with Jesus, who opposed the execution of justice upon him; and they might, perhaps, ascribe it to the special providence of God, rather than to the judgleness of Jesus, that they had received no farther damage. The most corrupt heart has its reasonings to support it, in its absurdest notions and most criminal actions.

\[1\] Let these go their way.\[1\] What tenderness was there towards those who had so lately neglected him (sleeping while he was in such an extreme agony), that yet he would not suffer them to be terrified by so much as a short imprisonment! and the words also intimate that he intended presently to dismiss them, as probably not thinking it convenient to appear before his judges with such an attendance. His disciples, perhaps might consider this speech as an excuse for their forsaking him; but had they viewed it in a just light, it would rather have appeared a strong engagement upon them to have waited for that fair dismissal which our Lord seemed about to give them.
They seize upon Jesus, and Peter cuts off Malchus's ear.

And then, as he was speaking this, they that were sent to apprehend him came, and laid their hands upon Jesus and took him prisoner without his making any manner of resistance. Now upon this, when his disciples saw they had seized him, and began to apprehend what would be the consequence of these things, they said to him, Lord, shall we smite these impious wretches with the sword? for we doubt not, but as few as we are, thou canst render us victorious over this armed multitude. And, without staying for his answer, behold, one of them that were with Jesus, [even] Simon Peter, having a sword, stretched out his hand, and drew it with a rash inconsiderate zeal, and smote a servant of the high-priest, whose name was Malchus, who was one of the forwardest, and seemed peculiarly officious in seizing Christ: and he struck full at his head, intending to cleave him down, but the stroke glanced a little on one side, so that he only cut off his right ear.

Then Jesus, being determined to surrender himself into the hands of his enemies, and still to shew that such a surrender was the effect, not of compulsion, but of choice, said unto Peter, Return thy sword into the sheath again: for I will not have recourse to this or any other method of defence: and indeed, all that take the sword shall perish by the sword, and they that are most ready to take up arms are commonly the

1 I have lost none.] Jansenius justly observes, that it was a remarkable instance of the power of Christ over the spirits of men, that they so far obeyed his word as not to seize Peter when he had cut off the ear of Malchus; or John, while he stood by the cross, though they must know them to have been of the number of his most intimate associates.

2 Even Simon Peter.] None of the evangelists but John mentions the name of Peter on this occasion; which, perhaps, the others omitted, lest it should expose him to any prosecution; but John, writing long after his death, needed no such precaution.

3 Smote a servant of the high-priest, &c.] One would have thought, as Bishop Hall observes, he should rather have struck Judas; but the traitor, perhaps, on giving the signal had mingled himself with the crowd; or Peter might not understand the treacherous design of his kis; or seeing Malchus more eager than the rest in his attack on Christ, he might postpone all other resentment to indulge the present sally of his indignation.—Though this might seem a courageous action, it was really very imprudent; and had not Christ by some secret influence overawed their spirits, it is very probable (as the pious Sir Matthew Hale observes) that not only Peter, but the rest of the apostles, would have been cut to pieces. (Hale's Contemplations, p. 254.)
Peter is rebuked for using his sword.

Jesus submits to his enemies, and cures Malchus's ear.

Then Jesus said in that same hour to the chief priests, and to the captains of the temple-guard, and to the elders of the people, or to those members of the sanhedrim who (as was said before, p. 353.) were so forgetful of the dignity of their characters as to come to him themselves with the dregs of the populace, at this unseasonable time, and on this infamous occasion: to these he said, and to the multitude that now surrounded him, for what imaginable reason are you come out against me, as against a robber that would make a desperate resistance, armed in this way with swords and staves, as if you came to seize me at the hazard of your lives? When I was with you every day, as I have been for some time past, publicly sate teaching in the temple, you had opportunities enough to have secured me, if there was any crime with which you could have charged me; yet then you did not apprehend me, or offer to stretch out your hands against me, but I know the reason better than you yourselves do: you have hitherto been kept under a secret restraint, which is now removed; and this is your hour, in which God has let you loose against me, and the power of darkness is now permitted to rage with peculiar violence; for it is under the instigation of Satan and his infernal powers that you now act, with whatever pious names you may affect to consecrate the deed. And in all this, I know, that both you and they are secretly over-

55 Then Jesus said [in that same hour] unto the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and the elders which were come to him [and to the multitudes:] Be ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves (for to take me?) [Mat. xxvi. 55. Mark xiv. 43.]

He touched his ear, and healed him.] As this was an act of great compassion, so likewise it was an instance of singular wisdom; for it would effectually prevent those reflections and censures on Jesus which the rashness of Peter's attack might otherwise have occasioned.

The captains of the temple. There was indeed a Roman guard and commanding officer which attended near the temple during the time of the great feasts, in order to prevent any sedition of the Jews: (see Joseph, Antig. lib. xviii. cap. 4. [al. 6.] § 3. and Bell. Jud. lib. v. cap. 5. [al. vi. 5.] § 3.) And this appears to be the band and captain mentioned here by John ver. 12. where the word in the original is ^\textsuperscript{b}\textsuperscript{a}y\textsuperscript{a} which plainly shews it was a Roman officer, and is the title given to Lysias, (Acts xxi. 31. & seq.) who was commander of the garrison kept by the Romans in the castles of Antonia; from whence detachments were sent at the time of the feast, and posted in the porticoes of the temple, to suppress any tumults among the people, when such great numbers flocked together. But for these captains of the temple spoken of by Luke, there is no doubt but they were Jewish officers, who are said by John to have attended with the former; of whom it is to be observed, that as the priests kept watch in three places of the temple, and the Levites in twenty-one, so their leaders were called ^\textsuperscript{\textit{u}}\textit{\textsuperscript{\textit{w}}}_\textsuperscript{\textit{v}}\textit{\textsuperscript{\textit{w}}} or captains of the temple; and Josephus speaks more than once speaks of one of the Jewish priests by this title, (Antig. lib. xx. cap. 6. [al. 5] § 2. cap. 9. [al. 8.] § 5. and Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 17. § 2.) (See Dr. Whitby in loc. and Dr. Lardner's Credib. part ii. Vol. i. book i. ch. ii. § 15.)

Then all the disciples, who but a little while before had solemnly protested that they would never leave him, when they now saw him bound in the hands of his enemies, according to his repeated predictions, forsook him and fled; each of them shifting for his own safety as well as he could, and seeking to shelter himself either among friends or strangers.

And a certain youth, who lodged in a house near the garden, and was waked by the noise of the tumult, having an affection for Jesus, and apprehending him in danger, arose out of bed with nothing but a linen cloth in which he lay, thrown about his naked body; and he followed him a little way after the rest of his disciples were gone, transported into a forgetfulness of his own dress, by his concern for Jesus: and the young men that made a part of the guard, suspecting he was one that belonged to Jesus, laid hold on him. But he, leaving the sheet which was wrapped about him in their hands, fled away from them naked, in the utmost consternation. THE heroic behaviour of the blessed Jesus, in the whole period of his sufferings, will easily make itself observed by every attentive eye, though the sacred historians, according to their usual but wonderful simplicity, make no encomiums upon it. With what composure does he go forth to meet the traitor! with what calmness does he receive that malignant kiss! With what dignity does he deliver himself into the hands of his enemies, yet plainly shewing his superiority over them, and leading as it were even then captivity captive!

We see him generously capitulating for the safety of his friends, while he neglected his own; and afterwards, not only forbidding all the defence they attempted to make, but curing that wound which one of his enemies had received in this assault on him. With what meek majesty did he say, Suffer ye at least thus far!

And he touched his ear, and healed him. We hear his words, we behold his actions with astonishment; but surely our indignation must rise within us when we see so amiable and excellent a Person thus injured and abused; when we see the Son of man betrayed with a kiss: betrayed by his intimate friend, who had eaten of his bread, and yet lifted up his heel against him, (John xiii. 18.) and at the same time forsaken by all his disciples, even by him whom he most tenderly loved, and who had so often leant on his bosom. Let us not wonder if some of our friends prove false; and others seem to forget us when we have the greatest need of their assistance. When we deserve so much less friendship than Christ did, let us not think it strange if we find but little more. Nor can we reasonably be so much amazed, as we might otherwise have been, to see sinners going on under the most awful rebukes of providence; when we consider that these wretches, who had been struck down to the ground by one word of Christ's mouth, should immediately rise up and stretch forth their impious hands against him, to seise and bind him; though they might well have known that they lived only by his indulgence and forbearance, and that the same word that struck them down to the ground could have laid them dead there. Touch our hearts, O Lord, by thy grace; or it will be in vain that we are smitten with thy rod!

In all the remainder of this story let us remember that Jesus voluntarily gave himself up to sufferings which he circumstantially foreknew; even though he could have commanded to his assistance whole legions of angels. His Father's will was an answer to all that nature could plead in its own cause; and the good hand from which this cup of his severest sufferings came, reconciled him to all the bitterest ingredients it contained. How reasonable then then is it that we who, having had fathers of our flesh that corrected us, submitted to the rod, and gave them reverence, should much rather, after the example of our innocent and holy Redeemer, be in subjection to the Father of our spirits, and live! (Heb. xii. 9.)

SECT. CLXXXIV.

Jesus is conducted to the palace of Caiaphas: Peter follows him thither, and denies him thrice, Mat. XXXVI. 57, 58, 69, to the end. Mark XIV. 53, 54, 66, to the end. Luke XXII. 54—62. John XVIII. 13—18, 24—27.

The officers and people having thus apprehended Jesus, in the manner described above, they led him away from the garden of Gethsemane to those who had employed them, and brought him first to the house of Annas; for he was father-in-law to Caiaphas, who was high-priest that year, or bore the office at that time: And Annas sent him bound to Caiaphas the high-priest, as judging it most proper that the rest of the council should upon this occasion be convened at his palace. Now this Caiaphas was he whom we mentioned above (John xi. 49—51, sect. cxli.) who gave it as his advice to the Jews, that it was fit that one man, though innocent, should die for the preservation of the people: in which words he uttered a kind of oracle, which (as we there observed) contained a far nobler and sublimier sense than he himself intended or understood.

And

a Led him away first to Annas, &c.] It appears from Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2 [n. 3], § 2, p. 873, Havercamp,) that Annas, whom he calls Ananus, had been high-priest before his son-in-law Caiaphas; it seems to have been by his interest, that first Eleazer his own son, and then Caiaphas, who married his daughter, and probably had been his deputy, obtained that dignity; so that though he had resigned that office himself, yet the people paid so much regard to his experience, that they brought Jesus first to him; who, no doubt, took all necessary care to prepare Caiaphas for receiving him, as he could not but know that this was a most critical juncture. We do not read of any thing remarkable which passed at the house of Annas; for which reason his being carried thither is omitted by the other evangelists. Cyril adds, μακαρίως ἔκτην ἐπωμιζεν τοῦτον Καίαφαν τὴν Λεγεσιαν, and they sent him bound to Caiaphas the high-priest; which addition Erasmus, Beza, and many others have thought it necessary to admit, both to account for the word ἀπείρως, first, in the preceding clause, and to reconcile John with the other evangelists, who all agree that the scene of Peter's fall was the palace of Caiaphas, not of Annas. Yet, as almost the same words occur in ver. 24, it is sufficient to transpose that verse, and introduce it here; which is intimated in the margin of some of our Bibles.—For the phrase of being high-priest that year, see note a on John xi. 49. p. 127.

And they who had apprehended Jesus took and led him away from Annas like a criminal in bonds, and, according to the directions which Annas had given them, brought him to the palace of Caiaphas the high priest: where, though it was now the dead time of the night, all the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, or the chief persons of the Sanhedrim, with their proper officers, met together on a summons from Caiaphas, and were assembled with him, waiting for Jesus to be brought before them.

And though Simon Peter had at first forsaken Christ, and shifted for himself, as the rest of his companions did, yet afterwards he and another disciple, even the evangelist John, be thought themselves, and determined to return; and accordingly they followed Jesus afar off, desiring to see what would become of him: and that other disciple was known to the high-priest, he was admitted without any objection or impediment, and went into the palace of the high-priest with Jesus and the guard that attended him. But Peter, who had no interest or acquaintance there, stood waiting without at the door: that other disciple therefore, who was known to the high-priest, went out of the inner-room, into which Jesus was then carried in order to his examination, and spake to her that kept the door to open it; and so by her consent brought in Peter. And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the large hall, and were set down together, Peter, hoping to pass undiscovered by mingling with the rest of the company, sat down among them with the servants, that he might be at hand to see the end of this affair, and warmed himself at the fire, while they were examining Jesus with circumstances which we shall afterward mention.

Matthew xxvi. 57. — And they that had hold on Jesus [Luke, took him, and] led him away, [Luke and brought him into the house of] Caiaphas the high-priest; where [all the chief priests, and] the scribes, and the elders were assembled [with him]. — [Mark xiv. 53. — Luke xxii. 54.]

John xvi. 15. — And Simon Peter followed Jesus afar off, and so did another disciple. That disciple was known unto the high-priest, and went in with Jesus into the palace of the high-priest. (Mat. xxvi. 58. — Mark xiv. 54. — Luke xxii. 54.)

Luke xxi. 35. — But Peter stood at the door without. Then went out that other disciple which was known unto the high-priest, and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter.

Luke xxii. 55. — And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them [with the servants to see the end,] [Mark and warmed himself at the fire]. [Mat. xxvi. 58. Mark xiv. 54.]

Luke xliii. 55. — And they who had apprehended Jesus took and led him away from Annas like a criminal in bonds, and, according to the directions which Annas had given them, brought him to the palace of Caiaphas the high priest: where, though it was now the dead time of the night, all the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, or the chief persons of the Sanhedrin, with their proper officers, met together on a summons from Caiaphas, and were assembled with him, waiting for Jesus to be brought before them.

And though Simon Peter had at first forsaken Christ, and shifted for himself, as the rest of his companions did, yet afterwards he and another disciple, even the evangelist John, be thought themselves, and determined to return; and accordingly they followed Jesus afar off, desiring to see what would become of him: and that other disciple was known to the high-priest, he was admitted without any objection or impediment, and went into the palace of the high-priest with Jesus and the guard that attended him. But Peter, who had no interest or acquaintance there, stood waiting without at the door: that other disciple therefore, who was known to the high-priest, went out of the inner-room, into which Jesus was then carried in order to his examination, and spake to her that kept the door to open it; and so by her consent brought in Peter. And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the large hall, and were set down together, Peter, hoping to pass undiscovered by mingling with the rest of the company, sat down among them with the servants, that he might be at hand to see the end of this affair, and warmed himself at the fire, while they were examining Jesus with circumstances which we shall afterward mention.

a And warmed himself at the fire, while they were examining Jesus, &c. It is remarkable that all the evangelists record the fall of Peter, and none with circumstances of greater aggravation than Mark, whose gospel is said to have been reviewed by Peter himself, and indeed written from his preaching. (See note on Mark xiv. 51, p. 534.) — Though Christ's examination happened during this interval (which occasions Matthew, Mark, and John, to interrupt this story to recount that), I rather chose, as Luke has done, to take the whole of it together, as best suitting the design of this work.

b Followed Jesus afar off.] It appears from hence that Peter and John recovered themselves quickly after their fight, or else they could not have followed him at some distance, and yet be so near as to be ready to go into Caiaphas's house with him.

c That disciple was known to the high-priest.] We cannot imagine the acquaintance was very intimate, considering the great diversity of their rank and station in life; but a thousand occurrences occasion some knowledge of each other, between persons whose conditions are as unequal.
And, during the time that this important event was depending, as Peter was sitting among the servants without the room where Jesus was examined, and thought to have continued unsuspected in the hall below, there came to him one of the maid servants belonging to the family of the high-priest, who was indeed the same damsel that (as we just now said) had kept the door: And seeing Peter as he sat warming himself by the fire she fixed her eyes earnestly upon him, and, observing in his countenance the appearance of great concern, she said to some that stood near her, I cannot but think that this man is a follower of Jesus, and was also one that used to be with him: and upon this presumption she charged him directly with it, and said, Tell us truly, Art not thou also one of this man's disciples? And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth [of Galilee.]

"Art thou also one of this man's disciples?" One would imagine from the word [also], when it is read in the connection John has placed it in, that in this question she referred to John; as if she had said, Art not thou one, as well as thy companion? And, if this were admitted, it would be a plain infirmity that John acknowledged himself a disciple of Christ. But it must be owned that the other evangelists used the same word [also], though they say nothing of John's being with Peter.

"He denied him before them all." How must these people be surprised when they saw (as, no doubt, some of them did) this ignoble disciple within the compass of a few weeks, when he was brought with John before the council, not only maintaining the cause and honour of Jesus, but boldly charging the murder of this Prince of life on the chief men of the nation, and solemnly warning them of their guilt and danger in consequence of it, Acts iv. 5—12. Perhaps, when it is said there (ver. 12) that they took knowledge of Peter and John that they had been with Jesus, the meaning may be, that some of them, or their attendants, remembered Peter and John as the two persons who had followed Jesus thus far, when the rest had forsaken him. Compare John xviii. 15, 16.

"I do not know him." Jesus was so public a person, and so well known to thousands, not at all in his interest, that this additional falsehood was most unnecessary; and, as it frequently happens, when people allow themselves to transgress the bounds of truth, it was more like to entangle and discover him than to clear him.
Peter denies his knowing him; and the cock crows.

Mark XIV.—68. And he went out into the porch, and the cock crew.

John XVIII. 18. And the servants and officers stood there, who had made a fire of coals (for it was cold,) and they warmed themselves; and Simon Peter stood with them, and warmed himself. John xviii.—25.—

Matthew XXVI. 71.—And when he was gone out into the porch [Luke, after a little while] another [maid] saw him [again], and said unto them that were there (as her fellow-servant had done just before, [Whatever he pretends, I verily believe this man was also with Jesus of Nazareth: and presently she began to say openly to them that stood by, Surely this is [one] of them that have endeavoured to bring all the nation into confusion, and while he would pass for a friend is crept in hither as a spy. They therefore, taking notice of what both these women had spoken, began to tax him with it, and said to him, What, have we a rebel so near us? Let us know plainly who thou art: art not thou also, who pretendest to enter these doors as a friend, [one] of his disciples who has been doing so much mischief? And, as he seemed in great confusion, another man that stood by saw him perplexed, and therefore charged it home upon him, and said, It is certainly so; thou art also [one] of them, and deservest to suffer

Luke XXII.—38.—And another saw him, and said, Thou art also of them.

1 He went out into the portico.] I apprehend that the word περίτοιος most exactly answers to the Latin word vestibulum, by which many good interpreters render it. And considering the magnificence of the Jewish buildings at this time, it is reasonable to conclude, that this, which belonged to the high-priest’s palace, was some stately passage or colonnade; and therefore I chose rather to render it portico, than porch, a word equally applicable to the meanest building of that kind.

k The cock crew.] It is strange this circumstance did not remind him of our Lord’s prediction, and bring him to some sense of his sin: perhaps it did; and he might return persuaded that he should be more courageous if he met with a second attack.

1 For it was cold.] It is well known that the coldness of the nights is generally more sensible in these hotter countries than among us.

LUKE XXII. 59. —

MARK XIV. 70. —

One of the servants of the high-priest (being his kinsman whose ear Peter cut off) saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with him?

MAT. XXVI. 74. —
Then [John, Peter denied again, and] began to curse and to swear, saying, [Luke, Man, I know not what thou sayest;] I know not with thy Master. And Peter, as he could not bear his being taxed so closely with it, that he might take off all suspicion of his belonging unto Jesus, again denied [him] in the strongest manner, even with an oath, and said, Man, why dost thou talk thus? I solemnly assure thee, and call God to witness to it, that I am not one of them; and that indeed I do not so much as know the man, but came in hither out of mere curiosity, to learn the occasion of this public alarm, without the least interest in him, or any concern at all on his account, whatever may become of him.

And as he still continued there, imagining that he should now be safe from any further challenge, after a while, about the space of one hour after he had thus denied him, another man in the company confidently affirmed that the former charge was just, saying, Of a truth this man was also with him, and is a follower of this Jesus; for it is plain he also is a Galilean, and everyone knows that most of his disciples are of that country. And, upon this they that stood by came to him, and said to Peter again, Surely it is as this man asserts; and, notwithstanding thy denying it, there is no room to doubt but thou art also [one] of them, for thou art certainly a Galilean: and I know it, said one that was there, by thy speech; for such I have observed to be thy dialect and accent, as agrees [to that] country, [and] plainly discovers thee to be of Galilee, as most of this man's seditious followers are. And one of the domestic servants of the high-priest, being a relation of his whose car Peter had cut off, pressed the charge home upon him, and said, How can you have the assurance to deny it? Take heed what you say: did not I myself see thee in the garden with him? Then Peter, being terrified to the last degree to think of the danger to which he should be exposed, he was discovered to be the person that made the attack on the servant of the high-priest, which might in such a circumstance expose him even to capital punishment, denied it again

m With an oath.] Dr. Clarke conjectures that Peter was suffered to fall fonder than any of the rest of the apostles (except Judas the traitor), and to make more remarkable mistakes in his conduct, that we might thus be cautioned against that extravagant regard which would afterwards be demanded to him and his pretended successors. Clark's Seventeen Sermons, No. 10. p. 256.

b The
again more violently than ever; and, that he might not any more be called in question, he began to curse and to swear, and solemnly to imprecate the judgment of God upon himself, if it were so; [saying] as he had done before, I tell thee, man, I know not what thou meanest by such a false and groundless accusation; I do not so much as know this man of whom you speak; and was so far from being in the garden with him, that I am absolutely a perfect stranger to him. And he had no sooner thus denied him in this shocking manner, but immediately while he yet spake, the words of Jesus were fulfilled, and, according to the warning he had given him, the cock crew the second time.

Luke xxii. 61.

And Jesus having been examined by the council in a more retired room, was now brought back into the hall, while they were consulting what they should do with him, so that he stood within hearing when Peter thus ungratefully denied him; and hearing such shocking language from a voice so familiar to him, just as those dreadful words proceeded out of his mouth, the Lord turned about, and looked upon Peter with a mixture of earnestness and tenderness in his countenance, which, through the secret energy of the Spirit that went along with it, pierced him to the very heart: and then Peter recollect ed the word of the Lord Jesus, how he had said to him but that very evening, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. (See Mark xiv. 62 30, p. 344.) And Peter could no longer bear the place, nor stand in the sight of his injured Master, but immediately went out 6 quite overwhelmed with grief and shame; and covering [his head] with his mantle 8, he seriously reviewed not [this] man *[of whom ye speak]. And immediately [Luke, while he yet spake] the cock crew [the second time.] [Mark xiv. 71, 72.—Luke xxii. 60.—John xviii. 27.]

The cock crew.] To reconcile this with what the Jews pretended, that all the cocks used to be removed out of Jerusalem at the time of the passover, some would render αλυσωριηφωντος. The watchmen proclaimed the hour of the night: but this is so unnatural an interpretation, that, rather than admit it, one would question the truth of that Jewish tradition; or conclude, that if the custom it asserts did prevail in Christ's time, some cock was accidentally left behind, or returned unobserved to this place. The hurry of such a night as this might have occasioned much greater neglects than this supposes.

And Peter went out.] It is observable that Luke in two or three lines here calls him three times by the name of Peter; that memorable name which Christ had given him with a particular view to that fortitude and resolution with which he was to defend the gospel: perhaps thereby intending to intimate how less this courageous hero was now fallen, and yet to what a height of holy magnanimity he was afterwards raised, and thereby enabled to stand as a rock in that sacred cause, and so fully to answer the name with which his Master had honoured him.

And covering his head with his mantle.] Raphaelis, and some learned critics, would render ειποςανθρωπα, throwing himself out of the company in a passionate manner, which it is very probable he did; but others, ap viewed that heinous crime in which he had discovered so much weakness and ingratitude; and when he attentively thought thereon, and entered into all its aggravating circumstances he wept bitterly, and most earnestly entreated the Divine pardon for so great and inexcusable a sin.

IMPROVEMENT.

How loudly does this affecting story speak to us in the words of the apostle, Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall (1 Cor. x. 12). Peter professed the warmest zeal; and gave his Lord repeated and no doubt, very sincere assurances of the firmest resolution in his cause; and yet, except Judas the traitor, none of his brethren fell so low as he. But a few hours before he had been with Christ at the sacred table, and had heard from his own lips those gracious discourses which, as echoed back from his word, do still strike so strongly on the heart of every true believer. He had just seen those words remarkably, and even miraculously, verified, that Jesus having loved his own that were in the world, loved them to the end. (John xiii. 1.) How reasonably then might it have been expected that his own should also have continued their most zealous and constant affection to him! But Peter, who, if possible, was more than doubly his as a disciple, as an apostle, as a distinguished intimate, most shamefully denies him; and that not only once, but a second, yea, and a third time, even with oaths and curses, as if he would by that diabolical language give a sensible proof that he did not belong to Christ; and who indeed, that had heard it, would have imagined that he did? Nay, to aggravate it yet farther, it was done in the presence of the other disciple, and even of Christ himself, who surely was much more painfully wounded by this perfidiousness of Peter than by all the rage and fury of his enemies. Lord, what is man! What is our boasted strength but weakness! and, if we are left unto ourselves, how do our most solemn resolutions melt like snow before the sun! Be thou surety for thy servants for good! (Psal. cxix. 122.)

and particularly Elsner, (Observ. Vol. I. p. 165, 166), and Lambert Bos. (Exercit. p. 21, 22), with much better authority, would translate it, covering his head, which was a token of mourning and shame; but becoming Peter on this occasion. (Compare 2 Sam. xv. 20. Esth. vi. 12. and Jer. xxiv. 2)—As for our version [when he thought thereon], I can find no passage in antiquity in which the word has such a signification; thought to be sure that phrase expresses what was truly the case. I have therefore inserted it in the paraphrase, as I would take every opportunity of paying all due respect to so valuable a translation as ours is in the main.

John xviii. 15, 16

Jesus is examined at the high-priest's hall.

The Lord turned and looked upon Peter. So may he graciously look upon us if we at any time make any approach towards the like sin! May he look upon us with a glance which shall penetrate our hearts, and cause floods of penitential sorrow to flow forth! 62 Peter went out, and wept bitterly. He quitted that dangerous scene where temptation had met and vanquished him; and chose retirement and solitude to give vent to his overflowing soul. Thus may we recover ourselves; or rather, thus may we be recovered by Divine grace from those slips and falls which in this frail state we shall often be making! Let us retire from the business and the snares of life; that we may attend to the voice of conscience, and of God speaking by it; and may so taste the wormwood and gall, that our souls may long have them in remembrance. To conclude; let us express the sincerity of our godly sorrow by a more cautious and resolute guard against the occasions of sin, if we would not be found to trifle with God when we pray that he would not lead us into temptation, but would deliver us from evil.

SECT. CLXXXV.

Jesus is examined at the high-priest's hall, and afterwards condemned by the sanhedrin on confessing himself to be the Messiah. Mat. XXVI. 59—68. Mark XIV. 55—65. Luke XXII. 63, to the end. John XVIII. 19—23, 28.—

JOHN XVIII. 19.

We now return to the examination of Jesus before the council, the thread of the story having been a little interrupted on the sad occasion of Peter's fall. The high-priest therefore 19 asked Jesus, as he stood before him, concerning his disciples, and concerning his doctrine; what it was that he taught, and with what view he had gathered so many followers. 20 Jesus answered him, and said, What I have taught has been delivered in the most public manner, and I have spoke it openly and freely to the world; I have always, as I had proper opportunity, taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whether the Jews continually resort in the greatest numbers; and have said nothing in secret, even to my most intimate friends, but what has been perfectly agreeable to the tenor of my public discourses. Why dost thou therefore ask me, whose testimony in my own cause will not, to heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said.

22 And when he had thus spoken, one of the officers which stood by struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the high-priest so?

23 Jesus answered him, If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?

Mat. XXVI. 59.—Now the chief priests and elders, and all the council, sought for false witness against Jesus, to be sure, be much regarded in such a circumstance as this, when I am standing as on a trial for my life? Ask those that heard [me], what I have spoken to them in the whole series of my ministry; for behold they know it, and I am willing to appeal to any impartial person among them as to the innocence, propriety, and usefulness, of what I have said.

Such was the calm and rational reply which Jesus made to those that examined him. But when he had spoken these things, one of the officers belonging to the court, who then stood by, rudely gave Jesus a blow, saying, Dost thou presume to answer the high-priest thus, by sending him to others for a reply to his question? And Jesus, with his usual mildness, answered him, If thou hast been one of my hearers, and canst say that I at any time have spoken evil, either of God or man, in the course of my preaching, thou wilt do well to bear thy testimony concerning that evil; but if I have spoken well, why dost thou strike me? Can reason be answered by blows? or can such a sober appeal to it deserve them?

Now the chief priests and the elders of the people, and the whole sanhedrim, with all its officers, not being able to make out a sufficient accusation against Jesus from such answers as these, maliciously endeavoured by the vilest means to have something criminal alleged against him; and as they were determined to condemn him, that they might colour over their proceedings with some form of law, they sought for false evidence against Jesus, that they might put

* Gave Jesus a blow.] As the word θυσίων is supposed by many etymologists to be derived from ρηκός, a staff, or stick, Beza would therefore render it, he smote him with a stick; but the word is apparently used for any blow; and to limit it, as our translators do, to what we commonly call a slap on the face, does not seem reasonable; though Sauidas explains it so; and Mat. v. 39. intimates it may have that sense.

b If I have spoken evil, either of God or man, in the course of my preaching, &c.] The pious and ingenious Mr. Bonnel (whose exemplary life deserves frequent reading, and whose Harmony is in the main very judicious) is the only writer I have met with who seems to give the true sense of this clause. He urges the use of the word διαβολα for Christ's teaching (ver. 20, 21), and observes, that hearing witness could not refer to the answer he had just made to the high-priest; but might properly be used as to the course of his preaching, which the high priest had not heard. He also supposes that in Christ's appeal to his hearers the person who smote Christ was singled out by his eye, among others, as one who had been his auditor; and that the language of the blow was in effect as if he had said, This is what I think your preaching deserves. But as he himself seems to assign another reason for this blow, even the pretended rudeness of this answer Christ had made to the high-priest, I have not followed Mr. Bonnel in my paraphrase on the preceding verse. See Bonnel's Harmony, p. 352.

Mat. XXVI

60 But put him to death; and managed the trial in so partial and unjust a manner, that they did in effect invite any of the most infamous of mankind to come and depose against him; with the assurance of being favourably heard: But they found none that fully answered their purpose; for though many false witnesses came, and falsely testified against him, yet they found none sufficient; [for] the testimonies they gave did not so far agree together, as that a capital sentence could be passed upon him on that evidence; since such a case required, at least, the concurrent oath of two persons. (See Deut. xvii. 6. xix. 15.)

At last there came two false witnesses, [who], maliciously wresting some words he had formerly spoken relating to his own death and resurrection, rose up, and falsely testified against him, saying, upon their oaths, This fellow said, in our hearing, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it up again in three days: and would any one talk of destroying it unless he was an enemy to that holy place? or think of building it again so soon, unless he was in league with Beelzebub? [Yea] one of them, designing to aggravate the matter, confidently affirmed; We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days time I will build up another, which shall be made without the help of hands, in obedience to my command. Yet neither thus did their testimony exactly agree, nor was sufficient to convict him; as evidently appears from comparing the different words in which it was expressed: and as this difference was observed in court, they could not for shame proceed upon the evidence so as to

Jesus, to put him to death. [Mark xiv. 55.]

60 But found none; [for] though many false witnesses came [and bare false witness against him,] yet found they none; [for their witness agreed not together.] [Mark xiv. 56.]

At the last there came two false witnesses, [who arose, and bare false witness against him.] [Mark xv. 57.

And said, This fellow said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days.

Mark XIV. 58. We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands.

But neither so did their witness agree together.

Sought for false evidence,—but found none.] As this was a great proof of Christ's innocence (for otherwise his confederates might have been glad to purchase their own security by impeaching him,) so it is a singular instance of the power of God over men's minds, that for all the rewards these great men could offer, no two consistent witnesses could be procured to charge him with any gross crime. Possibly the exertion of his miraculous power in striking to the ground those that were most forward to seize him, might intimidate the spirits of some who might otherwise have been prevailed upon.

Designing to aggravate the matter,
He is led away from thence to the sanhedrin.

However they resolved to try him in full council, even on this slender evidence, hoping that some further discovery would arise in the process of the examination. And accordingly, as soon as it was day, after a very short recess, the elders of the people and the chief priests, and the scribes, who made up the sanhedrin, assembled together; and they led Jesus away from [the house of] Caiaphas the high-priest to their council, or to that magnificent chamber where their court used to sit for the dispatch of public business. And, producing what imperfect evidence they had to give some colour to their proceedings, while no regard was shewn by Jesus to such false and frivolous accusations, the high-priest stood up in the midst of the council, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou nothing? What is it which these witness against thee? [Mat. xxi. 62.]

Luke xxii. 66.- And as soon as it was day, the elders of the people, and the chief priests, and the scribes came together, and led [Jesus from Caiaphas] into their council [John xviii. 23.]

Mark xiv. 60.- And the high-priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou nothing? What is it which these witness against thee? [Mat. xxi. 62.]

61 But [Jesus] held his peace, and answered nothing. [Mat. xxvi. 63.]

Luke xxii. 67.- [And they said,] Art thou the Christ? tell us. And he said unto them, If I tell you, you will not believe. And if I also ask you, you will not answer me, nor let me go.

68 And if I also ask you, you will not answer me, nor let me go.

Mark xxvi. 65.- And [again] the high-priest answered and said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ the to condemn Jesus to death for words which no two persons could pretend to ascertain; nor would they indeed have amounted to a capital crime if they had jointly been charged upon him.

And they said to him, Why art thou so much upon the reserve? Dost thou give up the pretensions thou hast formerly made, or dost thou still maintain them? If thou art indeed the Messiah, tell us plainly, and it will bring matters to a short issue. And he said to them If I tell you ever so plainly, I know that you will not believe: And if I also ask [you,]

68 Wherefore it is that you persist in this unreasonable infidelity, you will only overbear me with renewed violence, and will neither answer nor dismiss me.

And again the high-priest answered and said to him, Think not that such evasions will suffice in an affair of such importance as this: thou knowest I have a way of coming at the certain truth, and therefore I adjure thee in the most solemn manner, by the name and authority of the living God,

\[\text{\textit{vol. ii.}}\]
Being adjured to tell whether he be the Christ, he owns it.

God, whose high-priest I am, and to whom he has committed the power of administering this oath, that thou tell us directly, in the plainest terms whether thou be the Messiah, the Son of the ever-blessed God, or not?

And Jesus boldly said to him, Thou hast said [rights] and mentioned me by my true and proper title; for I am indeed the Messiah, nor will I ever recede from that claim: and moreover, though you may now condemn me to death for asserting it, yet I solemnly declare to you all, That hereafter the day will come, when ye shall see the Son of man, who now stands in this despised and lowly form at your tribunal, exalted to all the dignity and glory which that high title imports, sitting at the right hand of the power and majesty of God, and coming with irresistible strength in the clouds of heaven, to take vengeance on the proudest of his enemies.

And upon this, as they were willing to make sure of so important a confession, they pressed him with the question again, and all said, as in amazement, Art thou then really the Son of God, who is promised under the character of the Messiah? and wilt thou actually abide and stand by this profession, that thou art? And he said to them, I will never retract it; ye say right, and may be assured that I am.

Then the high-priest, with all the hypocritical forms of pious indignation, rent his clothes, as in grief for the great dishonour done to God by so false an oath, and so presumptuous a claim, as he pretended this to be; and he said, He has now spoken the most direct blasphemy; in professing himself to be the Son of the most high God; What

Son of [the blessed] God? [Mark xiv. 61.]

Luke xxii. 70. Then they all, Art thou then the Son of God? And he said unto them, Ye say that I am.

Mat. xxvi. 65. Then the high-priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses? Behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. [Mark xiv. 63, 64.]

1 To whom he has committed the power of administering this oath.] That the Jewish high-priests had indeed such a power may appear from comparing Exod. xxiii. 11. Lev. v. 1. and Prov. xix. 24. xxx. 9.

2 Thou hast said right.] See note 1, Mat. xxvi. 23, sect. clxx. p. 256.

3 Ye shall see the Son of man, &c.] There seems a plain reference here to the view in which the Son of man is represented, Dan. vii. 14, where he is said to come with the clouds of heaven to receive a dominion, &c. or to appear, as God did on mount Sinai in a chariot of clouds attended by angelic hosts. Our Lord looked very unlike that person now: but nothing could be more awful, majestic, and becoming, than such an admonition in these circumstances.—Dr. Whitby excellently proves, in his note on Mat. xxvi. 64, that the right-hand of power is a phrase equivalent to the right-hand of God.

4 Rent his clothes.] Though the high-priest was forbidden to rend his clothes in some cases, when others were allowed to do it, (Lev. xxi. 10, yet in case of blaspemny, or any public calamity, it was thought allowable. (See 1 Mac. xi. 71. and Joseph. Bell. Jud. lii. 15. § 2, 4.) Calaphas therefore by this action expressed in the strongest and most artful manner his horror at hearing so vile a wretch, as he pretended Jesus was, thus claiming the sovereignty over Israel, and a seat at the right-hand of God, and this when adjured upon oath on so solemn an occasion.

They
They all declare he is worthy of death, and abuse him.

66 What think ye? They answered and said, He is guilty of death: [Luke, What need we any further witness? for we ourselves have heard of his own mouth.] And they all condemned him to be guilty of death. [Mark xiv. 64. Luke xxii. 71.]

Luke xxii. 63.—Then the men that held Jesus mocked him, [Mark, and some began to spit in his face.] [Mark, and to buffet him:] and [others] smote him [Mat. xxvi. 67. Mark xiv.—63.] 64 And when they had blindfolded him, [Mark, the servants] struck him on the face [with the palms of their hands,] and asked him, saying,

What further need have we of witnesses? Behold now you have heard his blasphemy with your own ears. What think ye therefore as to the punishment he deserves? They answered and said, He is guilty of the most notorious of all crimes, and deserves immediately to be put to death; what need have we indeed of any other testimony? for we ourselves have heard [it] from his own mouth. And thus they all condemned him as guilty of a capital crime; and accordingly sentence was passed upon him, no witness appearing in his defence, and none daring to plead his cause; though some of the council, who had a friendship for him, and particularly Joseph of Arimathea, and Nicodemus, disapproving these unfair righteous proceedings, either absented themselves, or withdrew, (Compare Luke xxiii. 50, 51, and John xix. 38. sect. cxci.) Then the men that attended the court and had Jesus in custody, finding he was condemned by the sanhedrim, insulted him with renewed injuries and affronts, and carried that insolent usage yet further than they had done before; for some of them with rude indignity began even to spit in his face, and to buffet him; and others scornfully abused and beat him: And, in decision of his title to the character he claimed, having covered his eyes, the officers and servants struck him on the face with the palms of their hands, and on the head with staves: and, in a scoffing and contemptuous manner, asked him, saying,

1 They answered and said, He is guilty of death.] A man who did not know the mighty influence of attachment to an hypothesis by frequent observation, would be astonished that any learned, accurate and candid writer, should not be able to see the mark of a judicial process and sentence here; and yet should see them in the case of Stephen. Yet this is really the case.

3 No witness appearing in his defence, &c.] Dr. Samuel Harris, in his Observations on the Old Testament, (p. 109, & seq. quarto edit.) has, with much greater learning and ingenuity than solidity, endeavoured to prove this circumstance referred to in Isaiah's words, chap. lii. 8. Who shall declare his generation? and his first and second dissentions prefixed to his essay chiefly centre in this point.

5 Carried that insolent usage yet farther than they had done before.] Luke mentions these indignities before his being led to the council, in which he tells us he was examined on oath, as above; but Matthew and Mark mention them as immediately succeeding his being condemned, as guilty of blasphemy in the answer he made when adjudged by the high-priest; and do not so particularly as Luke distinguish what happened in his examination at the house of Caiaphas from other subsequent circumstances. The attentive reader will observe how they are formed in our compound text into one consistent narration. I do not see it necessary to suppose that Christ answered to two adjurations, the one some hours after the other. Matthew and Mark naturally enough relate the whole of his examination together, though carried on in two different places; and it is probable some insults preceded, and others, yet more violent, followed, his being thus solemnly condemned by the sanhedrim as guilty of death.

Reflections on the examination of Jesus by the Jews.

Improvement.

Thus was the patient Lamb of God surrounded by his blood-thirsty enemies: Thus did the dogs encompass him, and the strong bulls of Bashan beset him on every side; (Psal. xxi. 12, 16.) Thus was he brought as a lamb to the slaughter; and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth: (Is. lxi. 7, 8.) He was taken from judgment, and suffered the worst kind of murder, even that which had the appearance of being legal. But those gentle words which he dropped in the midst of all the injuries which were offered him are surely worthy ever to be recorded and remembered. It had always been his care to provide things honest in the sight of all men; and as he answered with a most graceful and courageous appeal to all that heard him, as to the innocence and usefulness of his doctrine: so it is well worthy our observation and reflection, that God so far restrained the rage and malice of hell, that no such false witnesses arose against him, as could on the whole asperse his character, or bring it under any brand of public infamy; though Judas, as well as others, might have sought a reward, or at least an indemnity, for their own villany, in accusing him. And indeed it is no inconsiderable instance of God's providential government of the world, that wicked men are restrained by this one remainder of reverence for the Divine omniscience, and dread of his vengeance, from destroying the reputations and lives of his children; especially in countries where (as in our own) the punishment which human laws inflict on perjury is so much below its desert.

When Jesus was examined on oath he witnessed a good confession, and cited those that were now his judges toappear at his bar. Nor was it a vain boast! The Son of man is now sitting at the right hand of power, and will ere long come in the clouds of heaven:

[And straightway] when the morning was come, all the chief priests [held a consultation with the] elders of the people, [and scribes, and the whole council,] against Jesus, to put him to death. [Mark xv. 1.]

MAT. XXVII. 1.}

SUCH were the vile proceedings of this horrid and malignant night, and thus was Jesus condemned, and treated as a malefactor by the Jewish rulers. And as soon as morning was come, all the chief-priests, having put Jesus out of the room where the sanhedrim met, consulted with the elders of the people, and the scribes, and the whole sanhedrim, what method they should take to execute this sentence they had passed against Jesus, and how they might contrive to put him to death in the most severe and contemptuous manner.

And after he had been insulted by the ser- vants at the council-chamber, when for the greater security they had bound him again, the whole multitude of them arose, and led him away from thence to the praetorium (as it was properly called) or to the judgment-hall, in which the Roman magistrate was used to sit for the dispatch of public business; for the Jews being now a conquered people, and not having the power of life and death in their hands, they could not execute Jesus without a warrant from the a All the chief priests consulted, &c.] Many critics explain this of their adjourn ing to consult together, from the house of Caiaphas, to the place where the sanhedrim used to meet; but it appears from Luke this was the place where they had before assembled and passed sentence upon Jesus after his first examination in the house of Caiphas; and his account of this matter is so circumstantial, that I think it more reasonable to take these words in the order in which they are explained in the paraphrase. Compare Luke xxii. 66, page 371.

b [When they had bound him again.] They bound him when he was first apprehended, but had, perhaps, loosed him while he was under examination; or else they now made his bonds stricter than before, that so they might secure him from any danger of a rescue or escape as he passed through the streets of Jerusalem.

the Romans; and therefore, to procure their order for his death, as well as to render it the more ignominious and painful, they determined immediately to carry him to them; and to ask, not a confirmation of the sentence which they had passed upon him as a blasphemer, but a new sentence of crucifixion against him, as a seditious enemy to Cæsar's government. Accordingly, having conducted him to the prætorium, they in a solemn way delivered him, as a state prisoner of considerable importance, to Pontius Pilate the procurator or governor, whom Tiberius Cæsar had, some years before this, sent among them.

And though by this time it was broad daylight, yet it was very early in the morning, and much sooner than the governor used to appear: he was therefore called up on this extraordinary occasion, but they themselves went not into the palace, of which the judgment hall was a part, because it was the house of a Gentile, and they were apprehensive lest they should be polluted, and so prevented from eating those sacrifices which were offered on this first day of unleavened bread, and were looked upon as a very considerable part of the passover, of which the paschal lamb, which they had eaten the evening before, was only the beginning.

Pilate therefore, willing in this instance to oblige the heads of the nation he governed, complied with their request; and, having as before obtained a delay of twenty-four hours, he shewed himself to them with all the appearance of indifference, and sternly asked the meaning of their unlawful assembly. But they, persevering in their united demand, and agitating the passions of Pilate by express quotations from the sacred scriptures, and by solemnly looking his eyes in the face, at length induced him, by threats of civil war, to yield to their request.

John XVIII. 28—And it was early, and they themselves went not into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the passover.

30 They answered and said unto him, If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee.

Then said Pilate unto them, Take ye him, and judge him according to your law.

—The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death.

4 A notorious offender.] So I render this word in this connection, because they had still the power of inflicting lighter punishments; so that their bringing him to Pilate was a proof that they judged him to have incurred a capital sentence. The word malefactor has much the same sense in our ordinary speech.

e With a view of shifting off from himself, &c.] Pilate could not be entirely ignorant of the case before him; for he began his government at Jerusalem before Jesus entered on his public ministry; and, besides many other extraordinary things which he must formerly have heard concerning him, he had, no doubt, been informed at large of his public entrance into Jerusalem the beginning of the week; and also of his apprehension, in which the Jewish rulers were assisted by a Roman cohort, which could hardly be engaged in that service without the governor’s express permission. It plainly appears by his whole conduct how unwilling he was to engage in this cause; he seems therefore cautious not to enter into the full sense of what the Jewish rulers intended when they called him a malefactor; and answers them in ambiguous language, which they might have interpreted as a warrant to execute Christ, if they found it necessary, and yet, which would have left them liable to be questioned for doing it, and might have given him some advantage against them; which a man of his character might have wished. Their reply shows they were more aware of this artifice than commentators have generally been.

crime of which the prisoner here before you is convicted, and as, after a fair trial, he had received such a sentence in the sanhedrim; we only wait your warrant to proceed to execution.

And, as Pilate could not but inquire of what crime he had been convicted, they resolved to mention that charge which might render him most obnoxious to the Roman power, and to represent the matter in its most malignant view; and accordingly they began with great violence to accuse him, saying, It is not merely on a religious account that we have brought him before you, but we have also found this seditious [fellow] perverting the whole Jewish nation, from one end of the country to the other, and in effect forbidding to pay tribute to Cæsar, by saying, that he himself is Messiah, a King, whom many of the Jews have expected to rescue them from all subjection to a foreign power: and this claim he has had the assurance to avow in open court; so that it is but a necessary piece of respect to thee, and to the emperor, whose lieutenant thou art, to bring him hither to be condemned, and indeed to leave him to be executed by you. And though they aimed at nothing more by this than to make sure of their murderous designs, and to add new circumstances of shame and agony to the execution, yet Providence was pleased to over-rule it with a wise intent, that the saying of Jesus might thus be fulfilled, which he spake more than once (see John iii. 14. xii. 32, 33. and Mat. xx. 19.) signifying or implying by what kind of death he should die, even by being lifted up from the earth, or by crucifixion, which was a Roman punishment; whereas according to the Jewish law (Lev. xxiv. 16.) he would have been stoned (as his servant Stephen afterwards was,) having been impiously adjudged by them to have deserved death as a blasphemer. (Compare Mat. xxvi. 65, 66, and Mark xiv. 64, p. 362.)

And when he was thus accused by the chief priests and elders, who aggravatd the matter by the addition of many other things, either entirely false, or grossly misrepresented; reproaching him as a blasphemer, a sabbath-breaker, and a magi-

As Jesus was silent, Pilate takes him and examines him.

13 Then said Pilate unto him, Answerest thou nothing? Art thou a king? Dost thou say this of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?

14 And Pilate answered them again, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation, and the chief priests, have delivered thee unto me: What hast thou done?

15 Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom was of this world, then should my servants fight, that I should be delivered from them: but now is my kingdom not of this world.

16 Then answered Pilate again and said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth hearth me.

17 Pilate saith unto him, What is truth? He spake thus: when he knew that he was set on by the chief priests, he spake politic words.

18 Then said Jesus unto him, Art thou a ruler of the Jews? Answer Pilate, What is truth? Jesus answered, When thou art come unto me, thou shalt know the truth, and the truth shall make thee free.

To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth hearth me.

temporal dominion, and to establish any claim which should at all interfere with that of Caesar, or of which any prince has reason to be jealous. Indeed if I would have entertained such views, I might have found support and encouragement from the very persons who are now my accusers: and if I had asserted that my kingdom was of this world, and had favoured such methods of defence my servants, who professed of late so great and so public a regard to me, would resolutely have fought, that I might not have been delivered to the Jews, or would attempt even now to rescue me out of their hands: but now my kingdom is not from hence, nor to be erected here; and therefore I have been so far from arming my followers with secure weapons, that the guard who came to apprehend me know I forbade their making use of those they had.

37 Pilate therefore said to him, Thou speakest however of thy kingdom and thy subjects: art thou then really a king?

And Jesus answered him and said, therein courageously witnessing a good confession (1 Tim. vi. 13), Thou sayest [right]; I am indeed, as thou hast said, a King; the king of the Jews, and the appointed Head and Governor of the whole Israel of God; nor will I ever basely seek my safety by renouncing my Divine claim to most excellent majesty and extensive dominion: nay, for this purpose was I born, and for this end I came into the world from another and much better abode, that I might bear witness to the cause of truth in general; and in particular to this great and fundamental branch of it: and I have given such ample proof of this, that every honest and well-disposed person, who is indeed a friend of the truth, heareth my voice, on Christ's side but a few days before; and the reason of their turning against him was his not assuming a temporal kingdom, as they certainly expected he would have done. (See Lardin, Credid, part i. book i. chap. 5, Vol. i. p. 301.) And we may further add, that a very small body, of forces, under a leader endowed with such miraculous power as Jesus lately exercised, might have been sufficient to vanquish all the Roman legions. voice, and pays an entire deference to my instructions. Pilate says to him, What is the truth which thou referrest to, and speakest of as thy business to attest? and when he had said this, as Jesus made a pause, and did not immediately make him any answer, his hurry would not allow him to wait for it: so he went out again to the Jews, and said to the chief priests, and the people assembled with them abroad, I have examined the prisoner you brought me in private; and I must freely declare that I find no fault at all in this man, nor can I perceive that he is any enemy either to the rights of Caesar, or the tranquility and happiness of the Jews; and therefore do not see how I can with any justice condemn him to die. But his accusers refused to acquiesce in this, and advanced a more circumstantial charge against him, which gave occasion to that examination before Herod, which will be related in the next section.

How much exactness in the ceremonials of religion may be found in those who have even the most outrageous contempt for its vital principles and essential duties! Yea, how much of that exactness may be made subservient to the most mischievous and diabolical purposes! These wolves in sheep's clothing would not enter into the house of a heathen, lest they should be polluted, and become unfit to eat the passover; yet they contrive and urge an impious murder, which that very heathen, though he had much less evidence of Christ's innocence than they, could not be brought to permit without strong reluctance, and a solemn, though vain transferring of the guilt from himself to them.

Justly might our Lord say in the words of David, They laid to my charge things which I knew not; (Psal. xxxv. 11.) But what can defend the most innocent and excellent against malicious slanders and defamations! Or who can expect, or even wish, wholly to escape, when such accusations are brought against Christ, even by the rulers of his nation, who should have been men of

SECTION LXVII.

Distinguished generosity and honour! But instead of this, they were all an assembly of murderers, and lay in wait for their prey, like so many devouring lions.

Pilate would renew the examination of the cause; and so far he acted a cautious and an honourable part. Yet, alas, how many that set out on such maxims want courage and resolution to pursue them! But the courage of Christ never failed. He witnessed before Pontius Pilate the good confession we have now been reading

(1 Tim. vi. 13); and owned himself a King, though at the same time he declared (what it were to be wished all his followers had duly regarded) that his kingdom is not of this world. Greatly do we debase it, if we imagine it is; and most unworthy is it of those that call themselves the ministers of his kingdom to act as if they thought it was. Yet such is the wickedness of some, and such the blindness of others, in the Roman church, that, though of all the churches in the world it is manifestly the most secular kingdom, it arrogates to itself the name not only of a part, but of the whole, of Christ's kingdom here below.

Christ came to bear witness to the truth; and a careful attendance to his testimony will be the best proof we can give that we love the truth, and the best method we can take to make ourselves acquainted with it. And of so great importance is the truth, that it surely deserves the attentive inquiry and the zealous patronage of the greatest and the busiest of mankind. Let us not therefore, when we begin to ask what it is like Pilate, hurry on to some other care before we can receive a satisfactory answer; but joyfully open our minds to the first dawning of that celestial day, till it shine more and more to irradiate and adorn all our souls. On the whole, imperfect as the character of this unhappy governor was, let us learn from him candidly to confess the truth, so far as we have discovered it; let us learn more steadily than he to vindicate the innocent and worthy, and on no terms permit ourselves, in any degree, to do harm to those in whom, on a strict and impartial inquiry, we can find no fault.

It is manifestly the most secular kingdom, Mr. Boyse of Dublin has finely illustrated in his most ingenious discourse on these words.

SECT.
SECT. CLXXXVII.

Luke XXIII. 5.

It was observed in the preceding section, that when Pilate came out of the palace, he bore an open testimony to the innocence of Jesus, and declared to the priests, in the presence of the people, that "he found no fault at all in him;" but they not only continued strongly to urge their accusation, but were more violent than before, saying, We assuredly know that he stirs up all the people, teaching the most dangerous and seditious doctrines throughout all Judea, beginning from Galilee, that factions country, where he has been most busy, and from thence making a progress even to this place, and gathering up followers every where by the way, to the apparent danger and damage of the state.

And when Pilate heard them speak of Galilee, he presently inquired if the man whom they had brought before him was a Galilean. And finding that he was of that country, and therefore that he properly belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, who was tetrarch of Galilee, he willingly embraced this opportunity to clear himself of so perplexing an affair, and immediately sent him away to Herod, who being himself a Jew, was also at Jerusalem in those days, having come up to celebrate the passover there.

And when Herod saw Jesus he rejoice exceedingly;
Pilate finding he was a Galilean, sends him to Herod:

Sect. cxxxvii. Pilate now had a long time been very desirous to see him, because he had heard much concerning him in Galilee (compare Luke ix. 7, 9. sect. xxiii. ix.) and now hoped that he should have an opportunity so far to satisfy his curiosity as to see some miracle done by him, and might be able also to determine whether he was, as he had once suspected, John the Baptist risen from the dead. (Compare Mat. xiv. 2. Vol. ii. p. 404.) And he examined him in many words, concerning a variety of particulars, both as to his pretensions and the proof of his mission, as well as the tenor of his doctrine: but as Jesus knew this was not a proper time and circumstance to enter into those questions, of which Herod might long ago have been sufficiently informed, he made him no answer.

10 And the chief priests and scribes, whose malice had prompted them to attend him the rather, stood in the presence of the king, eagerly accusing him of the same crimes which they had before charged him with in their application to Pilate.

11 And Herod, with those of his soldiers who now attended him as his life-guard, looked upon Jesus with disdain, and treated him in a very contemptuous manner, like a poor inconsiderable creature, who no way answered the account they had heard of him, neither saying nor doing any thing to gratify their curiosity; and hearing derided [him] for pretending to be a king (as it was urged by his accusers he had done,) in public contempt of that claim, whatever it was, Herod clothed him with a splendid robe, and sent him back to Pilate, thereby intimating, that he left him to do what he pleased with his prisoner, but that for his own part he apprehended his pretensions to royalty worthy of derision rather than serious resentment.

12 And, whatever Pilate's real intentions were, the compliment of sending Jesus to be examined by him, was so well taken by Herod; and Herod's sending him back to the Roman governor was,

6 A splendid robe: This expression ἐν ἑτέτερῳ λαμπρῷ does not so properly signify (as Le Clerc renders it) a white robe; nor was it, as he supposes, intended as a declaration of his innocence. It was rather some gorgeous garment which belonged to Herod or some of his officers, and was perhaps, grown old, and they clothed him with it in derision of his having pretended to be a king. This usage was exceeding insolent: perhaps the remorse of conscience which Herod had felt on account of the murder of John the Baptist might render him cautious how he joined in any attempt on the life of Jesus, which we do not find that he did.

9 Then he questioned with him in many words; but he answered him nothing.

10 And the chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused him.

11 And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate.

12 And the same day day Pilate and Herod were made friends together; for before they were at enmity between themselves.

13 And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests, and the rulers, and the people,

14 Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people: and behold, I having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him;

15 No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him, and he, nothing worthy of death is done unto him.

16 I will therefore chastise him; and later, if it be true that he deserved a capital sentence, I will send him back again to you. And Pilate, having received an account of what had passed before Herod, called together the chief priests, and the rulers, and with them the rest of the people who had appeared against him as his accusers; And said to them, You have brought me this man, Jesus of Nazareth, as one that has perverted the people, and taught doctrines injurious to your religion, and also to the civil peace and the Roman government; and behold, I have examined [him] both in your presence, and in private, and heard all that could be alleged against him; but I must solemnly declare that I have found no crime in this man as to the things that you have charged him with; nor can I in my conscience think that you have made good any of the accusations you have brought against him: Nor yet has Herod been able to make any such discovery; for I sent you to him with the prisoner, that you might do your utmost to convict him before that prince, who being a person of your own religion, and well acquainted with your laws and customs, might have known more of the matter than myself; and yet behold, it appears to have been Herod's judgment, that nothing worthy of death has been done by him for, instead of sending him back like one who deserves a capital sentence, he has treated him like an idiot rather than a traitor, so as plainly to shew that he thinks him merely the object of ridicule, or to deserve at most but some slight punishment. And therefore, when I have chastised him by scourging, which will be an c- They were at enmity between themselves.] The cause of this enmity can only be conjectured; perhaps it might be the slaughter which Pilate had made of some of the Galileans who had come up to sacrifice at Jerusalem. (See Luke xiii. 1, sect. cxv.) But Mons. Saurin truly observes, that, considering on the one hand the jealousy of the Jews where any foreign power was concerned, and on the other the oppressive measures generally taken by those who are invested with commissions like this which Pilate bore over conquered countries, and especially the accounts we have of his own bad character and conduct, their reconciliation is much more wonderful than their enmity. See Saurin, Serm. Vol. x. p. 246, 247.

d- Nothing worthy of death has been done by him.] The phrase γονάκις τιμίων must here have this signification, as the margin of our Bible renders it; for though this is something of an unusual construction, yet as Rophelius (Annot. ex Polyb. p. 259) has produced many instances of the like nature, it would be much harsher to suppose that a capital sentence, or any treatment from Herod which should intimate he thought Jesus deserved it, should be called after Jesus, something worthy of death.

an admonition to him for the future not to use those wild enthusiastic expressions which have given so much umbrage and suspicion, I will let [him] go: and I believe you may depend upon it that he will give us no farther trouble; nor would he have interest enough to do it if he were inclined to the attempt.

Now it was usual at the feast of the passover, [and] even was grown by custom in a manner necessary, for the Roman governor, when such multitudes were assembled from all parts, to release to the people any one prisoner, whom they desired to be set at liberty, whatever crime it was that he was charged with. And there was then in Pilate's custody a very infamous and noted prisoner, whose name was Barabbas, that lay bound with some other ruffians who had made an insurrection in the city in conjunction with him, and who had also committed murder in the insurrection; and, besides the part he had acted in this sedition's riot, he was a fellow of a most abandoned character, and known to be a robber, who had infested the highways with his villany; so that it was generally concluded he would receive sentence of death, and would be executed that day. And, as the power of reversing or executing such sentences then lay in the Romans, the people therefore, when they were gathered together about the tribunal, began with a great noise and clamour to demand of Pilate [that he would do] at this passover as he had always done to them upon the like occasion, and would discharge a prisoner.

And Pilate hoping that he might preserve the life of Jesus, whose innocence he so clearly saw, determined to attempt it by this method; and accordingly, that he might induce them to choose him, he proposed no other alternative than that scandalous and outrageous criminal whom we have just now mentioned, and answered them, saying, You have indeed a custom, that I should release to you one at the passover; and I am ready now to oblige you in this affair: whom will you therefore choose that I release unto you? 10 (For he knew that the chief priests had delivered him for envy.) [Mat. xxvii. 18.]

11 But the chief priests [and elders] moved [and persuaded] the people, that they should ask that he should rather release Barabbas unto them, and destroy Jesus.] [Mat. xxvii. 20.]

MAT. XXVII. 21. — The governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you?

LUKE XXIII. 18. And they [John, all] cried out [John, again] all at once, saying, [John, Not this man, but Barabbas!:] Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas. [Mat. xxvii.—21. John xxi. 40. —]

MARK XV. 12. And Pilate answered, and said again unto them, What will ye then that I shall do [with Jesus, which is called Christ] whom ye call the king of the Jews? [Mat. xxvii. 22.]

15 And they [all] cried, bas, that seditious and murderous robber? or this Jesus, who is called Christ, who in I know not what strange sense is pretended to be the king of the Jews, and whom you see before you in the fine robe in which Herod has thought fit to array him? For he knew that the chief priests and rulers had not delivered him up into his hands from a regard to justice, but merely out of envy at his popularity; and therefore he was willing to make the proposal to the people in such a form as might be most likely to secure his life. But the chief priests and elders, who were exceedingly solicitous to obtain their end, lest this artifice of the governor should defeat all their laboured scheme, excited the most forward of the people, [and] effectually persuaded the mob they had brought with them, that they should ask the governor, with a continued noise and clamour, that he would rather release Barabbas to them; that by this means the point they had in view might be secured, and they might be sure to destroy Jesus. And therefore when the governor answered them in this manner, and said to them again, Take notice that your choice lies only between these, and therefore now determine for yourselves which of the two do you desire I should release unto you? Then, as their principles had prompted them, they all cried out again with one consent, in the same noisy and tumultuous way as before, saying, We will not have this man, but Barabbas; away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas. And thus, when Pilate would have let him go, they denied the holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto them. (Acts iii. 14.) And Pilate, to divert them from the purpose they were so unreasonably set upon, again answered and said to them, What therefore would you have me do with this Jesus who is called Christ, and whom, if I may believe your own rulers, so many of you are ready to call and own as the king of the Jews? And they all presently renewed their clamour, and cried out again, as before, [and] with one voice said to him,

"Whom you call the king of the Jews.] Pilate often repeats this title: and it may seem strange that he should use it so frequently. Probably he might do it partly to ridicule those pretences, and bring contempt on the scheme of a Messiah; and partly to procure from the Jews, in their zeal against Jesus, the strongest and most public professions of their subjection to Cesar. * Let him, Crucify him; let him immediately be crucified; for he is fit to be treated as the vilest slave, rather than to be called our king. Pilate therefore, being still desirous to release Jesus, spake to them yet again; urging them seriously to consider what they did, in thus preferring such an abandoned miscreant as Barabbas to so innocent a person. But they, without so much as offering any farther reason, persisted in their importunity, and cried out as before, saying, Crucify [him], crucify him.

And Pilate, was so intent on delivering him, that he said to them a third time, Why will you be so cruel as to insist upon it? what evil has he done? I declare to you all, as I told you but now, (ver. 14, p. 385.) that I have found no capital crime in him: I will therefore, as I said (ver. 16.) chastise him by scourging, and then I hope your rage will be moderated, and you will be prevailed upon to agree that I should let [him] go without any farther punishment.

But they, without pretending to answer the argument he had alledged, overbore it by a wild fury, and were urgent in pressing him with loud and importunate voices; and the more he opposed them, they cried out the more abundantly and violently, demanding that, whatever was the consequence of it, he might be crucified; and, on the whole, notwithstanding the farther remonstrance of Pilate on the admonition of his wife (which will be mentioned in the next section,) their voices, and [those] of the chief priests, (who, to encourage the cry, had so little sense of common decency as themselves to join in it,) prevailed with the governor, though contrary to the conviction of his own conscience, to comply with their request.

IMPROVE-

1 Let him be crucified.] By this cry they declared the greatest degree of rage that can be imagined; for it was as if they had said, "Let him whom you call our king be treated like one of the vilest of your slaves, who has committed the most enormous crime." To have inflicted such a punishment as this on any free Jew would probably have been sufficient to have thrown the whole city and nation into an uproar; but now they were deaf to everything but the clamour of passion, and in their madness forgot with how dangerous a precedent they might furnish the Roman governor. And indeed it turned dreadfully on themselves, when such vast numbers of them were crucified for their opposition to the Romans, during the time of their last war. See note c in the next section, on Mat. xxvii. 25.

2 Why? what evil hath he done? Tv^v yap xexxaX xecov; Raphelius, (Annot. ex Xenoph. p. 64.) has well proved, that yap is often used by the correctest Greek writers, and particularly Xenophon, as an elegant espehion, especially to introduce a question.
IMPROVEMENT.

Behold, how all imaginable circumstances seem to conspire to increase the infamy thrown on that sacred head, which now most worthily wears a crown of eternal glory! Of a truth, O Lord, against thy holy Child Jesus, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the chief priests, and all the people of Israel, were gathered together, to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel had determined before to be done, (Acts iv. 27, 28.) The wisest person on earth was by Herod and his soldiers derided as a fool: the most deserving was condemned by the chief priests: and the most innocent was treated as a criminal by Pilate, and furiously demanded as a public victim by the Jews. All the proofs of his innocence are overborne by a loud and senseless cry: and those hosannas with which the streets and temple were so lately echoing, are exchanged into Crucify him, crucify him. So uncertain is human applause, and so unrighteous may human judgments be.

But in the midst of all, the blessed Jesus stands collected in himself. Firm as a rock he bears the violence of the storm, and is not moved by all the furious waves that beat upon him; and when he saw a robber and a murderer preferred before him, and a sentence of the most cruel death clamorously called for and demanded against him, he silently commits himself to him that judgeth righteously, who ere long brought forth his righteousness as brightness, and his salvation as a lamp that burneth. (Compare 1 Pet. ii. 23. and Isa. lxxii. 1.)

Lord, if thou callest us out to share in thy sufferings, may the Spirit of God and of glory thus rest on us! And may neither the scorn nor the rage of our enemies separate us from thee, who did so courageously bear all this for us; nor may they ever sink us into any weakness of behaviour unworthy of those who have the honour to call themselves thy followers!

SECT. CLXXXVIII.

Pilate, having again and again renewed his efforts to persuade the Jews to consent that Jesus should be released, at length yields to their importunity, and delivers him up to be crucified. Mat. XXVII. 19, 24—31. Mark XV. 15—20. Luke XXIII. 24, 25. John XIX. 1—16.—

John XIX. 1.

Then Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged him.

John XIX. 1.

Then, as the priests and people of the Jews continued their clamorous demand that Jesus should be crucified, Pilate thought it most advisable... advisable to seem at least to consent to it, and therefore took Jesus and scourged him; hoping that, after he had been severely scourged, the rage of the populace would be something abated, and they might at last be prevailed upon to consent that he should be dismissed.

Then the soldiers of the governor, knowing that it was the Roman custom to scourge prisoners just before they were put to death, interpreted Pilate's order on this head as a declaration that he was immediately to be crucified: and therefore they took Jesus [and] led him away into the common-hall [called Praetorium], and gathered unto him the whole band of soldiers. [Mark xv. 16.]

28 And they stripped him, and [clothed him with purple, and] put on him a scarlet robe: [Mark xv. 17. — John xix. 2.] And and when [John, the soldiers] had platted a crown of thorns, they put it upon his head, and a reed in his right-hand: and they [began to salute him, and] bowed the knee before him, [and worshipped him] and mocked him, saying, Hail, Hail, Hail, Hail.

Then the soldiers, &c.] The evangelist John so plainly speaks of their crowning our Lord with thorns, and these other indignities, as previous to Pilate's last attempt to save him, that I think it proper to transpose those verses in Matthew and Mark, which mention those circumstances as after his condemnation, and immediately preceding the execution. Some of them might probably be repeated after Pilate had delivered him to be crucified, while the instruments of death were preparing; and therefore Matthew and Mark mention the whole series of these cruelties together: or the word τῆς, then (which is used by Matthew,) may only signify that it was done about that time,) not to determine the order of each particular so absolutely as to be inconsistent with the most accurate and distinct account which John gives of the whole process of this affair. Many instances of the indeterminate use of that particle occur in the evangelists: See Mat. ix. 14. xxiv. 40. Mark xiii. 14. 26. Luke xxi. 10. 21. and John xix. 16.

b It is certain they intended hereby to expose his pretended royalty to ridicule and contempt: but had that been all, a crown of thorns might have served as well. They undoubtedly meant to add cruelty to their scorn, which especially appeared in their striking him on the head when this crown was put on.—If the best descriptions of the eastern thorns are to be credited, they are much larger than any commonly known in these parts.
Pilate's wife sends to him to let Jesus alone.

Hail, king of the Jews: [John, and they smote him with their hands:] [Mark xv. 17, 18—19. John xix. 2—3.]

coronation-day: [and] bowing the knee before him, they did him reverence in a scoffing way, and mocked him saying, All hail thou most magnificent king of the Jews! Hail mighty Monarch! we give thee joy of thine accession to the crown! and then approaching him as if they would have offered him some present, as is usual on such occasions, they smote him with their hands: And proceeded so far as to spit upon him, even in his very face; and at last took the reed, or cane, out of his hand, and barbarously struck him with it on the head; and so as it were, nailed down the thorns into his forehead and temples, and occasioned thereby exquisite pain, as well as a great effusion of blood: all which this holy Sufferer bore with the utmost meekness and composure, neither reviling nor threatening them, but silently committing himself to the righteous invisible Judge. (1 Pet. ii. 23.)

In the mean time Pilate was taken up with trying and condemning some other prisoners who were to be executed that day; and while he thus was sitting on the tribunal he had erected, his wife, having by this time been informed that Jesus had been brought before him, and was going to be given up to death, sent a very important message to him, saying, I beseech thee see it, that thou hast nothing to do with the blood of that righteous One, against whom the Jews are now demanding judgment; for I have suffered many things to-day on his account in a dream, and have had such terrible views represented to my imagination in my sleep this very dreamt these things that morning, since Pilate rose; and as the Heathens imagined these dreams most significant which came about break of day, she might on that account lay the greater stress upon them. Janscenis thinks she had now a representation of those calamities which afterwards befell Pilate and his family. (See note in the improvement.) But it is an unaccountable thought of Mr. Fleming, that the devil might be the author of this dream, by which he might endeavour to prevent the death of Christ according to the prophecies. His two arguments, from her calling Christ a man (which is merely taken from our version, for in the original it is only τὸ ἄνθρωπον, that righteous One) and from the disquiet which this dream gave her, are too inconsiderable to need a particular reply. See Fier. Christ. Vol. II. p. 345.

Mat. xxvii. 19.
very morning, that I cannot but look upon it as something Divine; and conclude that if thou dost upon any terms consent to his death, it will be attended with dreadful consequences to thyself and thy family.

Pilate therefore, alarmed by such a message as this, went into the common-hall himself to see what they were doing with the prisoner; and when he beheld with strong emotion all those indignities and torments which Jesus had borne, and saw how severely the soldiers had scourged him, thinking that the sight of him in so sad a condition might move the Jews to compassion, he determined to make one trial more. And accordingly he came out again to the public tribunal where the Jews were assembled, and having ordered Jesus to be led thither, he said to them, just before he appeared, Behold I am bringing him out to you again, that ye may know and observe it, that I can find no fault in him, though the tortures he has now undergone are such as must surely have brought him to confession, if he were indeed guilty.

Then, as he spake these words, Jesus came out of the praetorium wearing the thorny crown, and the purple robe, now also dyed in his own blood, which streamed forth from all parts of his body: and Pilate said to them, Behold the man I view him attentively; and when you see what dreadful things the poor unhappy creature has suffered, let that content you; for surely considering his innocence, he has suffered already much more than enough.

When therefore the chief priests and [their] attending officers saw him, fearing lest the people should relent, they presently renewed their exclamations, and eagerly cried out as before, saying, We know the man sufficiently: away with him to the cross: crucify [him], crucify [him]; and immediately order the wretch to be executed.

Pilate on this said to them, if ye are thus resolute and inexorable, I leave him in your hands, to dispose of him as you think fit: take ye him therefore, if it must be so, and crucify [him] yourselves; but I desire to discharge myself, from having any thing to do in it, either by myself, or by my Roman guards; for, as I have told you again and again, I find no fault in him worthy of any such punishment.

John XIX. 4. Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him.

5 Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man.

6 When the chief priests therefore and officers saw him, they cried out, saying, Crucify him, crucify him.—

—Pilate saith unto them, Take ye him, and crucify him: for I find no fault in him.
The Jews then answered him, There is no room to represent him as a faultless person, nor any reason to be backward to condemn him; but these objections you have made oblige us to mention one circumstance which, for the horror of it, we would willingly have concealed: we have a Divine law which we received from heaven, by which blasphemy is forbidden on the highest penalties; and by this our law he ought to die, though he were not chargeable with sedition and treason, because he has made himself the Son of the most high God, in such a sense as no creature can be; and this he declared but this morning in open court. (Compare Mat. xxvi. 63, 64. Mark xiv. 62. and Luke xxii. 70, p. 372.)

When Pilate therefore heard this expression, he was still more afraid than before; for the Romans believed many poetical stories of men begotten by their deities, and thought them a kind of demi-gods, who could not be injured without engaging their divine parents in the quarrel. And therefore apprehending that his wife’s dream might also take its rise from such a cause, he entered again into the palace, and taking him aside, he said to Jesus, Tell me plainly from whence thou camest, and from whom art thou descended? and what is this Divine original which thou art charged with claiming? But Jesus, knowing that his innocence was already apparent, even to the conviction of Pilate’s conscience, gave him no answer to that question.

Then

He was still more afraid than before.] Though I think, with Mr. Cradock, and several others, the interpretation given in the paraphrase the most natural; yet I cannot forbear mentioning that of Dr. Lardner, who thinks he was afraid of a sedition among the Jews, from his knowledge of their great obstinacy in any thing in which religion might seem to be concerned: and he adds, he might be the more reasonably alarmed on this head, as since the beginning of his government he had met with two remarkable instances of their stiffness; one in an attempt he made to bring the image of Caesar into Jerusalem; the other in a design he had formed of supplying the city with water at the expense of the sacred treasury of the temple. See Lord Cradock, part i. Vol. i. p. 330—338.

Whence art thou?] It is strange Mr. Locke should think (as he does in his Reasonableness of Christianity, Vol. i. p. 153,) that Christ declined giving him an answer, lest, when he heard he was born at Bethlehem, he should have any such apprehensions as Herod had entertained. Pilate probably knew nothing at all of that prophecy, as Herod himself indeed did not, till he had learnt it from the Jewish scribes whom he consulted on Christ’s birth. (Mat. ii. 4, 5, 6. Vol. i. p. 78.) The answer which our Lord had made to his former inquiries shewed how far he was from declining any danger; and the true reason of his present silence was that Pilate’s unsteady conduct rendered him unworthy of any farther information.
Then Pilate in surprise said to him, What, dost thou make me no reply, and not so much as speak to me in such a circumstance as this, in which thy life is so evidently concerned? Dost thou not know that I have power and authority to crucify thee, and have power to release thee, if I please, notwithstanding all the clamorous demands of thine enemies; therefore he who has delivered me to thee, even the Jewish high-priest with his council, having far greater opportunities of knowing him and his law, hath the greater and more aggravated sin; yet thou thyself canst not but know that on the principles of natural equity an innocent person ought not to be given up to popular fury.

And from this time Pilate was so far satisfied of the injustice of the prosecution, and of the innocence of Jesus, that he endeavoured the more earnestly to release him. But the Jews still insisted on his passing sentence on him to be crucified; and apprehensive of the governor's design that Dost thou not know that I have power to crucify thee? &c.] Even they who maintain that the Jews had a power of executing capital sentences in Christ's time, acknowledge that power to have been under the control of the Roman governor; and that it was in fact so often controlled, that at last the Jewish sanhedrim removed from the chamber in which alone they could regularly pass them, that they might not have the mortification of seeing continually how little their decisions availed, when the most notorious criminal, if he had but money, could buy a pardon from their common masters. So that the dispute, after all the noise it has made in the learned world, seems at last to terminate in this nicety, whether the consent of the Roman governor were expressly asked before the Jews proceeded to an execution, or were taken for granted if the contrary did not appear? Or, in other words, whether the efficacy of a sentence passed by the Jews was owing to the express consent or the connivance of the Romans? The conduct of the Jews in this case seems to prove the former of these to have been the true state of the affair; and vindicates not only the substance of what Dr. Lardner has maintained, but the particular manner in which he expresses it. See note c on Mat. xxvii. 2, p. 375.

Thou couldst have no power at all against me except it were given thee from above.] Some have thought that the word power, from above, refers to the situation of the temple, which stood much higher than the pretorium; and that it is as if Jesus had said, I know that whatever thou dost against me is only in consequence of the sentence passed in yonder court held above; so that their guilt is greater than thine. But though this would very well account for the connection of the latter part of the verse, I cannot think it altogether just; for had Providence permitted Pilate to seize Christ as one dangerous to Caesar's dignity, he would have had as much power of putting him to death as he now had. It is therefore much more reasonable to suppose it refers to the permission of God's providence. No thought was more proper to the occasion; and I think the interpretation I have given to the latter clause in this view is natural, though not very common. But if any are not satisfied with it, they may consider whether the words may not be connected with the beginning of the verse, so that it might be translated, Thou couldst have no power at all against me, unless it were given thee from above for this purpose. (Compare note on John vii. 21, sect. xcix. Vol. I. p. 515.) Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Caesar.

13 When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment-seat, in a place that is called in Greek, Lithostrotum, or in Hebrew, Gabbatha,

14 And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour: and he said unto the Jews, Behold your king!

that they effectually might put a stop to his intention of discharging him, they eagerly cried out, saying, If thou let this man go off with his life, thou art not Caesar's friend, though thou bearest his commission, and representest his person; for everyone that makes himself a king of Judea speaks against Caesar our emperor, and in effect arraigns the legality of his government here.

When Pilate therefore heard that speech, he was very much alarmed, as he well knew how suspicious a prince Tiberius was, and how many spies he kept on all his officers, that nothing might be done or permitted by them in any of the provinces, which could at all interfere with his authority: and, that he might not then be charged with any want of zeal for Caesar's interest, he brought Jesus out of the palace again, and once more sate down on the tribunal, which was then erected (as was said before, p. 377.) without the palace, in a place called in Greek, Lithostrotum, or in Hebrew, Gabbatha, or the High-place, because it stood on an eminence, so that the judge, being seated there on his tribunal, might be heard and seen by a considerable number of people.

And it was then the preparation of the passover, or the sixth day of the week, and consequently the day which fell before the paschal sabbath, which was observed with some peculiar solemnity (see John xix. 31. sect. cxxii.) and the morning was so far advanced that it was drawing on apace towards the sixth hour, and was now about the third hour, or nine in the morning, which obliged them to dispatch, that they

1 As he well knew how suspicious a prince Tiberius was, &c.] Every body that knows the character of Tiberius, especially as illustrated by Suetonius in his excellent History, will see how naturally Pilate might be apprehensive on this head.

1 In Hebrew, Gabbatha.] There are various etymologies of this word. I think the most probable is that which derives it from נְדָב, elevavit, and so it intimates its being raised on high. It was, perhaps, a kind of stage, or scaffold, in the midst of a spacious area belonging to the palace, in which the governor might place himself on public, and especially on judicial, occasions. It plainly appears from the connection of the words that it was not in his house, but somewhere without, probably in some open place.

m Was drawing on apace towards the sixth hour, and was now about the third hour, &c.] Difficulties, which seem to me quite invincible, attend the reading which is generally received, [It was about the sixth hour,] whether we reckon it, according to the Roman method of computation, six in the morning, or, according to the Jewish computation, twelve at noon.
they might have execution done, as usual, before noon. And Pilate, finding he must, after all, yield to the people, and consent to the death of Jesus, lest his former struggle should be misrepresented at Rome, was resolved to manage this incident so as to procure from the Jews a public acknowledgment of Caesar's authority: and therefore, pointing to Jesus, as he now appeared in this mock pomp of royalty, he says to the Jews, who were present in vast numbers, 15 Behold your king, if you think fit to own him, as it is said many of you have done. But they again cried out with indignation and disdain, Away with [him] away with [him]; we are so far from owning him, that we desire thee to crucify him. Pilate says to them, What, shall I crucify your king? How strange, and how extravagant a demand is this! And the chief priests answered, in the name of all the people, We have no king but the emperor Tiberius Caesar, whose royal authority we all of us acknowledge, and will always maintain.

And Pilate, seeing that it signified nothing any longer to oppose the popular torrent, but that they

Mat. xxvii. 24.

The best commentators I know (and among the rest of late Dr. Guise) think the whole difficulty of reconciling these words of John with Mark, who tells (chap xv. 23, sect. clxxxvii.) that Christ was crucified at the third hour; and with Matthew and Luke, who exactly agree with him in fixing the time of that darkness which happened while Christ hung upon the cross (compare Mat. xxvii. 45; Luke xxiii. 44; and Mark xv. 33, sect. excl.); is easily solved by understanding it, according to the Roman account, of six in the morning. But as John was a Jew, and elsewhere seems to use the Jewish account (John i. 39, iv. 6, 52.) that very supposition is in general improbable. Or if, out of regard to the considerations which the learned, but here dubious and perplexed, Zellner has urged (see Zellner, Hor. Pilat. p. 14, & seq. we were to grant it in general a supposable case, very strong objections will lie against supposing it here. For though we should, with many critics, take it for granted that the passover here fell late in April (which was the latest it could fall), the sun would not rise at Jerusalem till near five o'clock, and one cannot suppose the sabbath day assembled till about break of day. How then is it possible that their condemnation of Christ, his arraignment and examination, first before Pilate, then before Herod, together with Pilate's repeated examinations of him, and conferences with the Jews about him, as also the change of dress, scourging, crowning with thorns, &c. should be dispatched by six? The very contents of the preceding sections seem to demonstrate the contrary. On the other hand, it could not now be twelve at noon, since Mark assures us to the contrary, and his account is confirmed both by Matthew and Luke. (See the places just now quoted, and note on Mat. xv. 25 sect. clxxxviii.) I cannot therefore but conclude with Cudgelius (Obser. p. 77), Beza, and Erasmus, that instead of the sixty we should read the third hour, that is, nine in the morning. For this we have the authority of the Cambridge manuscript, and of Peter of Alexandria, who expressly asserts it was έν τη θητη, in the original copy, which he says continued till his time; and though, as Dr. Mill abundantly shews in his Annotations on this place, all the best manuscripts and ancient versions are on the other side, I am obliged here to follow the superior authority of common sense; however, in submission to the greater number of copies, I have still retained the common reading in the version, and have only given what I apprehend to be the true reading in the paraphrase. Some other unsatisfactory hypotheses will be touched on in the note last referred to. See a large and accurate view of them in Wolf. Crit. Phil. Vol. I, page 969—976.
they rather grew more tumultuous by the delay, was determined however to do all he could to make his own conscience easy in complying with this their unjust request; and therefore he took water, and washed his hands in the presence of the multitude, saying, I call heaven and earth to witness that I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it.

25 Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children.

he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it.

25 Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children.

it could be done no other way, pronounced sentence, that what they demanded should be done, and that Jesus should be put to death.

And, in pursuance of that sentence, he released to them Barabbas, who (as was said before) was thrown into prison for sedition and murder; but whom, aggravated as his crimes were, they had Importunately desired in preference to Christ: and having (as we related above, John xix. 1, p. 390) already scourged Jesus, he did not renew that torture; however, he delivered him to their will to be crucified, with such circumstances as they thought proper; and they soon shewed that their tender mercies were cruel.

And when the Jewish mob had thus prevailed, after they had mocked and insulted him for a while, just as the Roman soldiers had before done in the praetorium, deriding his pretences to a kingdom, and abusing him like the vilest slave, they took the purple robe off from him, and having dressed him again in his own garments, they led him away to be crucified, in the manner which we shall presently relate.

IMPROVEMENT.

John xix. 13. Let us now, by a lively act of faith, bring forth the blessed Jesus to our imagination, as Pilate brought him forth to the people. Let us with affectionate sympathy survey the indignities which were offered him, when he gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; and hid not his face from shame and spitting; (Isa. l. 6.) Behold the man, wearing his purple garment of God, he lost all the advantage which he hoped to gain by this base compliance, as Felix did when he afterwards injured Paul on the same unworthy principles. Acts xiviv. 27.

Having already scourged Jesus:

Many critics, and among the rest Elssner (Observ. Vol. 1. p. 125), have shown that scourging used to precede crucifixion; but as John, who is most exact in his account of this part of the story, mentions his having been scourged before, and says nothing of the repetition of it (which, considering Pilate's conviction of his innocence, he would probably spare), I choose to interpret the word in this manner, which the original will very well bear. They took the purple robe off from him.'

It is observable, as we have seen above, p. 390. that Matthew (chap. xxvii. 28) mentions a scarlet robe, and Mark (chap. xv. 17, as well as here) a purple garment;

I take not upon me to determine whether either of these words be used for the other, waving, as in some other cases, the most exact significance; or whether there were two garments used, a purple vest, and over that a scarlet robe. However, it is probable, whatever they were, Pilate, or any of his chief officers, would not cover his bleeding body with any thing better than an old, and perhaps tattered habit, which answered their contemptuous purpose much better than the best which the governor's wardrobe could have afforded.

purple robe and thorny crown, and bearing the reed which smote him in his right hand for a sceptre! Behold, not merely the man, but the Son of God, thus vilely degraded, thus infamous abused! Shall we, as it were, increase his sufferings, and, while we condemn the fury and cruelty of the Jews, shall we crucify him to ourselves afresh, and put him to an open shame? (Heb. vi. 6.) Or shall we overlook him with slight and contempt, and hide our faces from him, who for our sake thus exposed his own? (Isa. liii. 3.)

Let the caution even of this heathen judge, who feared, when he heard he so much as pretended to be the Son of God, engage us to reverence him, especially considering in how powerful a manner he has since been declared to be so; (Rom. i. 4.) Let us in this sense—have nothing to do with the blood of this Just Person.—Let his example teach us patiently to submit to those sufferings which God shall appoint for us, remembering that no enemies, and no calamities we meet with, could have any power against us, except it were given them from above.

How wisely was it ordered by Divine Providence that Pilate should be obliged thus to acquit Christ, even while he condemned him; and to speak of him as a righteous person, in the same breath with which he doomed him to the death of the most flagitious malefactor! And how lamentably does the power of worldly interest over conscience appear, when, after all the convictions of his own mind, as well as the admonitions of his wife, he yet gave him up to popular fury. O Pilate, how gloriously hast thou fallen in the defence of the Son of God! and how justly did God afterwards leave thee to perish by the resentment of that people whom thou wast now so studious to oblige.

Who can without trembling read that dreadful imprecation, May his blood be on us, and on our children! Words which, even to this day, have their remarkable and terrible accomplishment in that curse, which has pursued the Jews through seventeen hundred years. Lord, may it at length be averted, and even turned into a blessing! May they look on him whom they have pierced, and mourn, till all the obstinacy of their hearts be subdued: till they

* Leave thee to perish, &c.] Josephus (Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 4 [al. 5], § 1, 2) expressly assures us that Pilate, having slain a considerable number of sedition Samaritans, was deposed from his government by Vitellius, and sent to Tiberius at Rome, who died before he arrived there. And Eusebius tells us (Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 7), that quickly after having, as others say, been banished to Vienne in Gaul) he laid violent hands upon himself, falling on his own sword. Agrippa, who was an eye-witness to many of his enormities, speaks of him in his oration to Caius Caesar as one who had been a man of a most infamous character (Plut. Jud. a Leg. p. 1034); and by that manner of speaking, as Valesius well observes, it is plainly intimated he was then dead. Probably the accusations of other Jews following him, had before that proved his destruction.

they bow down in glad submission to that King whom God has set on his holy hill, and thus are brought themselves to reign with him in everlasting honour and joy!

SECT. CLXXXIX.

Jesus, being delivered up by Pilate to the rage of the people, bears his cross to Calvary, and is there nailed to it. Mat. XXVII. 32—34, 38. Mark XV. 21—23, 25, 27, 28. Luke XXIII. 26—34. John XIX. 16—18.

John XIX. 16.

NOW after Pilate had passed sentence upon Jesus, to satisfy the restless clamour of the Jews, and had delivered him to the soldiers to be crucified, his prosecutors, having gained their point, hastened his execution: and having insulted and abused him (as was said before), they took Jesus and led him away to that terrible punishment.

And, to expose him to the greater ignominy and reproach, and to prejudice the people more strongly against him, there were also two other [men, who were] condemned to die upon the cross for a robbery, and were well known to be great malefactors, that were led out of Jerusalem with him, to be executed at the same time; that in such company he might be thought to suffer for the worst of crimes.

And Jesus, thus attended as a criminal, was led through the city, carrying a heavy part of his cross on his shoulders, according to the custom of those who were to be crucified: and in this manner he went out of the city to a place which lay on the western side of Jerusalem, but a little without the boundaries of it, which was a They took Jesus and led him away.] It is evident this text is parallel to Mat. xxvii. 31. and Mark xv. 20. But I have here, as some other instances of two or more parallel passages, put one at the conclusion of a former section, and the other at the beginning of the next, for a better connection.—I may also add that this seems to me the exact place of Mat. xxvii. 5—10, in which the evangelist relates the tragical end of Judas; but I hope I shall be indulged in transposing it, partly that I may preserve a better proportion in the length of the sections, and chiefly that I may not interrupt the important story of Christ's passion: and I more easily allow myself to do it, because probably the very same consideration engaged Matthew a little to anticipate it. Let it only here be observed, that the death of this traitor seems to have happened before that of his Master; so speedily did the Divine vengeance pursue his aggravated crime.

b Carrying a heavy part of his cross, went out of the city, &c.] Dr. Lardner has abundantly proved, from many quotations, that it was customary not only for the Jews (Numb. xv. 35. 1 Kings xxi. 13.

was called in the Hebrew language Golgotha; [or] the place of a scull; because the bodies of many criminals, having been executed on that little eminence, were buried there.

And as they led him on, Jesus was now so faint with the loss of blood, so very sore with the lashes and bruises he had received, and so fatigued with the load of such a large piece of timber, that he was not able to proceed so fast as they desired, especially considering how little time they had before them to finish their work. And as he was advancing slowly to the place of execution, they met on the road a poor African, who was a native of Cyrene, named Simon, the father of Alexander and Rufus, who afterwards became Christians, and were of some note in the church: this Simon at that time was passing by, as he came out of the country to Jerusalem; [and] they immediately laid hold on him as one fit for their purpose, finding him a strong man, and it may be suspecting that he was a favourer of Jesus: [and] pretending that the authority of the Roman governor empowered them to press any they met for this service, they compelled him to carry at least one end of his cross, and accordingly on him they laid the cross, that he might carry it after Jesus.

And a great multitude of people crowded after him to see the crucifixion; and particularly a considerable number of women, who had attended his ministry with great delight, followed him on this sad occasion; who were so tenderly affected with the moving sight, that they not only pitied him in their hearts, but also vented their concern in tears, and bewailed and lamented him in a very affectionate manner. But Jesus turning to them, said, Alas ye daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, who am willing to submit to all the sufferings appointed for me, as what I know will issue in the salvation of my people, and in my exaltation to the highest glory; but rather weep for yourselves, and for your children, in consideration of the dreadful judgments fastened; and which was called antenna, or surca, going cross the stipes, or upright beam, which was fixed in the earth. This the criminal used to carry, and therefore was called surca. See Bishop Pearson on the Creed, p. 205, 204.
judgments that these crimes will quickly bring upon this wretched people, whose calamities will be of much longer duration than mine. For, let it be remembered by you as my dying words, behold the days are surely and quickly coming, and some of you may live to see them, in which the innocent blood which this people have imprecated upon themselves shall come down upon their heads in so terrible a manner, that they shall have reason to say, Happy [arc] the barren women, and the wombs which never bare children, and the breasts that never suckled them: for as relations are multiplied, sorrows shall be multiplied with them, and parents shall see their children subject to all the miseries which famine, pestilence, and sword, and 30 captivity can bring upon them. Then shall they who are now triumphing in my death be trembling with horror, in expectation of their own; and, considering present calamities as the fore-runners of future, yet more intolerable miseries, shall begin in despair of the Divine mercy, to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills Cover us, from the more dreadful pressure of God’s wrath, which is kindled against us. For if they do these things in the green wood, what shall be done in the dry? If such agonies as these fall upon me, who am not only an innocent person, but God’s own Son, when I put myself in the stead of sinners, what will become of those wretches who can feel none of my supports and consolations, and whose personal guilt makes them as proper fuel for the Divine vengeance, as dry wood is to the consuming fire?

At length they arrived at the place of execution: and when they were come thither, even to the place which (we before observed) was called in Hebrew Golgotha, that is to say, the place of a skull, a little without the city [on] mount Calvary (which was the usual place for executing criminals, and seemed a proper spot of ground for the purpose, as on account of its eminence the malefactors crucified there might be seen at a considerable distance, and by a great number 34 of spectators); They proceeded to the fatal purpose for which they came: and as it was customary to give to dying criminals a potion of strong wine mingled with spices, to cheer their spirits, and render them less sensible of their sufferings, the soldiers who attended him gave him: 29 For behold, the days are coming, in which they shall say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the breasts that never suckled. 30 Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us.

Mat. xxvii. 33.–And when they were come to [the] place called Golgotha, that is to say, [the] place of a skull [Luke, or Calvary] [Mark xv. 22. Luke xxiii. 33.] 24 They gave him vinegar to drink, mingled

They gave him also wine to drink, mingled with myrrh.] Some think that this was red wine, called vinegar by Matthew; but apprehend the reasons which Dr. Edwards has produced (Exercit. part ii. No. 2. p. 178—188.) sufficiently prove that this wine mingled with myrrh was a different mixture from the vinegar and gall, which he received so far as to taste it. Probably those pious women, some of them (as the story shows) persons in plentiful circumstances, whose zeal engaged them to follow him to Calvary, and afterwards so liberally to prepare unguents and aromatic drugs for his embalming, had provided on this sad occasion some rich wine tempered with choice spices, which with perfect propriety he refused to taste, lest, malice should impute he intended thereby to render himself insensible of the terrors of death.

It was now the third hour of the day, or nine o'clock in the morning.] I can by no means agree with Vossius, and some other critics, to read it here the sixth hour; for there ought to be very cogent reasons for departing from the authority of all the best copies and ancient versions: (see Dr. Mill in loc.) Nor can I think, with Heinsius, that these words in Mark refer not to the hour of the day in which Christ was crucified, but to the length of time he had been upon the cross when his garments were divided, which Mark had spoken of just before in ver. 24. For as Mark mentions the sixth and the ninth hour (ver. 33.) this interpretation would oblige us to conclude, either that Mark used two very different ways of computation within the compass of a few verses, or else that Christ did not expire till he had been nine hours on the cross. And as these objections equally lie against Godwin's Hypothesis, (Morns and Aaron book iii. chap. i.) that we are here to distinguish between the four larger and twelve smaller hours into which the day was divided, I do not think it necessary more particularly to consider it, though the learned Gerhardus in his Harmony prefers it to all others.—Compare note e on John xix. 14. sect. clxxxviii. p. 395.

criminal of the three. And thus the scripture was remarkably fulfilled, (Isa. liii. 12.) in which the prophet Isaiah, speaking with an amazing plainness of the sufferings of the Messiah, saith, "And he was numbered with the transgressors."

And Jesus made no manner of resistance to this cruel violence, nor did he revile them even when they were distorting his limbs as on a rack, and nailing his hands and his feet on the full stretch to the accursed tree; but, in the midst of his anguish, he breathed out his soul in a compassionate prayer for his murderers; and pleading the only excuse which the most extensive charity could suggest, he said, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they are doing; The Roman soldiers, who were the immediate instruments of his death, having indeed but little knowledge of him; and the Jews, who were the authors of it, through their obstinate prejudices not apprehending who he was: "for if they had known him, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory." (1 Cor. ii. 8.)

IMPROVEMENT.

Here let us pause a while, and make a few serious reflections on this amazing story, which the evangelists relate with so much simplicity. Behold the Son of God bearing his cross, fainting under the load of it, and at length extended upon it, and nailed to it. Him they took, and with wicked hands crucified and slew him, (Acts ii. 23.) Blessed Jesus, was it, for this that thou didst honour our nature by a union to thine own, and come from thy throne of glory to visit these abodes of misery and guilt! Was it for this that so many gracious discourses were delivered, and so many works of love and power performed! for this, that thou mightest be treated as the worst of criminals, and suspended on a cross in the air, as if unworthy of a place on earth even to die upon!

[Mark xxvii. 56.—John xix.—18.] 28 And the scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And he was numbered with the transgressors.

Luke xxiii. 34.—Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.

John xix. 17, 18

Mark xv. 27, 28

e And he was numbered with the transgressors. I choose, in quotations from the English version of the passage quoted as the Greek will allow me, that the memory of the reader may assist him in distinguishing the text; else I should have rendered nearest, criminals, as the word ἁρμανίον, which Isaiah uses, seems also to signify. The least offence is a transgression of the law of God, or a stepping over the boundaries he has prescribed; but this import much more.

f Father, forgive them, &c.] This is one of the most striking passages in the world. While they are actually nailing him to the cross, he seems to feel the injury these poor creatures did to their own souls, more than the wounds they gave him; and as it were to forget his own anguish, in a concern for their salvation. I render as nearest, what they are doing, as thinking that version most expressive of the present circumstance; and indeed it is the exact import of what grammarians call the present tense.
Reflections on the crucifixion of Christ.

upon! Amazing and lamentable sight! Justly, O sun, mightest thou blush to see it: justly, O earth, mightest thou tremble to support it!

Lord, like these pious women, who had the zeal and fortitude to attend thee, when thine own apostles forsook thee and fled, we would follow thee weeping: yet not for thee, but for ourselves: that our guilt had brought us under a condemnation, from which we could be redeemed by nothing less than the precious blood of the Son of God: that Lamb without blemish and without spot, (1 Pet. i. 19.)—We should behold herein the goodness and the severity of God, (Rom. xi. 22.) for while the riches of his goodness are displayed in his providing a ransom for the redemption of lost sinners, an awful proof is given of the severity of his justice, in his not sparing his own Son, nor exempting him from the sorrows and sufferings due to sin, when he came to put himself in the stead of sinners: and may we not in such a view tremble for fear of him, and be afraid of his judgments? (Psal. cxix. 120.) Who can support the weight of his indignation, especially when it shall come aggravated by the abuse of so much love! If these things be done in the green wood, what shall be done in the dry? And if such sufferings be inflicted, where there was not any personal guilt to kindle the flame, on one who only answered for the sins of others; what then will be the end of those who, by their own iniquities, are become as fuel prepared for the fire, and are as vessels of wrath fitted to destruction?

How shocking is it to behold the vile indignities that were put upon a suffering Jesus, and to reflect upon the cruel treatment that he met with from his insulting enemies! Yet have not we been verily guilty concerning this matter? (Gen. xlii. 21.) Are we not chargeable with despising Christ? and have we not crucified the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame? (Heb. vi. 6.) O may that apology be heard in our favour! Father, for—give them, for they know not what they do! For surely sinners do not know what they do, when they pierce Christ by their sins, and turn away their faces from him.—But under all his sufferings, how amazing was his meekness! and how compassionate the concern which he expressed for his most cruel persecutors? May we learn patience, and love to our enemies, from so bright an example of it! May we, like him, bless them that curse us, and pray for them that despitefully use us, and persecute us! (Mat. v. 44.) Instead of being ingenious to aggravate their faults, and to paint them in the most shocking colours, let us rather seek for the best excuses, which even the worst of causes will fairly bear; influenced by that charity which unconstrained believes no evil, and hopeth all things even against hope. (1 Cor. xiii. 5, 7.)
The soldiers divide his garments by lot.

SECT. CXXIX.

Gracious Saviour! thy dying prayer, and thy dying blood, were not like water spilled upon the ground; they came up in remembrance before God, when thy gospel began to be preached at Jerusalem: and multitudes, who were now consenting to thy death, gladly received thy word, and were baptized, (Acts ii. 41.) and they are now in glory, celebrating that grace which has taken out the scarlet and crimson dye of their sins, and turned that blood which they so impiously shed into the balm of their wounds, and the life of their souls.

SECT. CXC.

Christ's garments are divided by lot; and while he is himself insulted on the cross, he shews his mercy to the penitent thief, Mat. XXVII. 35—37, 39—44. Mark XV. 24, 26, 29—32. Luke XXIII. 34—43. John XIX. 19—24.

JOHN XIX. 23.

The soldiers therefore, when they had thus crucified Jesus, took his garments, which according to custom they had stripped off, that the shame of suffering naked might be added to all the agony of the cross; and, as it was usual for the executioners to have the garments of the criminal whom they put to death, they made four parts, of his clothes, assigning to each soldier of the quaternion employed on that occasion a part, and casting lots upon them which of the four each man should take: and they took also the vest, or inner-garment; now the vest had this curious circumstance attending it, that it was without any seam at all, being woven from the top throughout in one whole piece. And as this was considered by them as more valuable than ordinary, they said therefore one to another, Let us not spoil this coat, as we must do if we go about to tear it into four parts, but let us cast lots for it, whose the whole of it shall be: and accordingly they did so, that the scripture spoken by the prophet David in the person of the Messiah might thus be literally fulfilled, which saith, (Psal. xxi. 18.) They divided my garments among them, and cast lots for my vesture.

These

a Woven from the top throughout in one whole piece.] Perhaps this curious garment might be the work and present of some of the pious women who attended him, and ministered to him of their substance, (Luke viii. 3.) The hint here given of its make, has set some mechanical heads to work to contrive a frame for weaving such a vest; and a good cut of it may be seen in Cabinet's Dictionary, on the word vestments, Vol. III. p. 119.

b They divided my garments among them, &c.
The title of King of the Jews is put over him on the cross.

These things therefore the soldiers did, though with the utmost freedom as to themselves, yet by the secret disposal of Providence, which, by an undiscerned influence on their minds, led them to act in a remarkable correspondence to the Divine oracle. And, having done thus, they sat down near the cross, and guarded him, and the other two who were crucified with him, that none might come there to rescue them before they were quite dead.

And, as the usual method was in cases of crucifixion, they put upon the cross over his head a superscription in capital letters, containing the substance of his pretended crime written in these remarkable words, THIS IS JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS. And indeed it was Pilate who wrote [this] title, and ordered them to put it on the cross; which, howsoever it was designed as a reproach to Jesus, was in effect a declaration of his real character; and by the secret providence of God was overruled in a remarkable and public manner to proclaim the kingdom of Christ, while it was only meant to expose and ridicule his title to it. Many of the Jews therefore that came up to the feast of the passover, read this inscription; because the place where Jesus was crucified was near the city, and lay but just without the gates: and that the inscription might be generally understood, it was expressed by Pilate’s order in three languages, and written both in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin letters, so that it might easily be read by Jews, Romans, and most other foreigners.

Now

&c. We are no where told that David’s goods were thus divided; and there are several other passages in the 22d Psalm, particularly that in which mention is made of piercing his hands and his feet, to which no circumstance of David’s personal sufferings seem to have borne any resemblance. It therefore seems to me exceeding probable that in this scripture, and some others the mind of the prophet was thrown into a preternatural ecstasy, in which on some secret intimation given to him that he therein personated the Messiah, he wrote expressly what the Spirit dictated, without any particular regard to himself; so that David might, for any thing I can find, with equal propriety have written such a psalm, if his whole life had been as prosperous and peaceable as the reign of Solomon his son. (Compare 1 Pet. i 10—12.)

§ That none might come to rescue them, &c.] This was the more necessary in this kind of execution, because the wounds given in crucifixion were not generally mortal. The person crucified died partly by the loss of blood, if any large vessel was pierced by the nails, when nails (as here) were used; but chiefly by the violent distorsion of the limbs, which were stretched forth as on a rack; a circumstance which must, no doubt, occasion exquisite anguish.

d They put over his head a superscription.] This Bishop Pearson (on the Greek, p. 205.) and Dr. Lardner, (Credibility, part i. book i. chap. 7, § 10, Vol. i. p. 347.) have abundantly proved to be usual in cases of any extraordinary punishment.

e In Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin letters.] It was written in Latin, for the majesty of
Now when this inscription was drawn up, the chief priests of the Jews were very much offended at the form in which it was expressed; and therefore objected against it, and said to Pilate, Do not write, The king of the Jews; for we entirely disown him under that character, as thou well knowest; but rather write, that he said, I am the King of the Jews. But Pilate, who was very much displeased at the importunity by which, contrary to his inclination and judgment, they had extorted from him the sentence of death he had passed upon Jesus, answered with some warmth, What I have written, I have written, and whoever may object against it, I am determined it shall stand as it is.

When therefore they were unable to procure any alteration, they were determined publicly to turn it into a jest; and therefore some of them went in person to Calvary to insult and scoff at Jesus even in his last moments. And the common people, that stood beholding the execution, reviled him; and even they that passed by on the road blasphemed him, shaking their heads at him in an upbraiding scornful manner; And saying, Ah thou vain boaster, that wouldest destroy the temple, and build it again in three days! let us now see if thou canst save thyself; and if thou art indeed the Son of God, give us a proof of thy power now, and come down from the cross; for in thy present circumstances that will be the most proper miracle thou canst work in confirmation of thy pretended mission. And in like manner also the chief priests, together with the scribes and elders, and the rulers also themselves, the malice of whose hearts had made them to forget the dignity of their characters, and to attend among the mob upon this base and barbarous occasion, joined with them in their scoffs, and with a scornful sneer derided him; and said, mocking said one to another, Ay, this is he that saved others, and undertook to give them perfect deliverance and everlasting happiness; [but] now you see he cannot save himself from the most infamous execution: if he be really the true

40 And saying, [Ah] thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself; [and] if thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross. [Mark xv. 29. Luke xxiii. 54.]

41 Likewise also the chief priests, [Luke, and the rulers also with them derided him, and mocking, said among themselves,] with the scribes and elders, [Mark xv. 31. Luke xxiii. 55.]

42 He saved others, himself he cannot save: if he be [Luke, Christ, the chosen of God,] true Messiah, the Elect of God, and in consequence of that Divine choice be the king of Israel, as he has so often pretended, let him now come down from the cross, and save himself from death, that we may see a demonstration of his saving power, and we will then believe him.\footnote{45 He trusted in God, let him deliver him now, if he will have him: for he said, I am the Son of God.}

And one of the malefactors \footnote{[Luke and save himself, ] that we may see,] and we will believe him. [Mark xv. 31, 32. And saying as the rulers and people had done, if thou art really, as thou hast frequently pretended, the King of the Jews, before thou undertakest to deliver them, save thyself from our power, and so begin to assert thy claim to a supreme authority. And one of the malefactors \footnote{\textit{[One of the malefactors also.]} We are told indeed by Matthew, in the plural number, that the thieves cast the same in his teeth; and Mark also says, that they that were crucified with him reviled him; and hence some infer that he who afterwards proved penitent, at first joined in the blasphemy: but had that been the case, surely Luke, in so particular a narrative as his, would not have omitted it. I therefore rather conclude, with most critics, that it is what is commonly called an enalage of numbers, the plural being (as elsewhere) put for the singular. (See note \textit{a} on Mark xiv. 5, sect. cxiv. p. 151, and note \textit{b} on Mark i. 21, sect. xxxv. Vol. I. p. 190.)} who hung on the cross with him, regardless of that innocence and dignity which Jesus manifested under all his sufferings, and unaflected with a sense of his own aggravated guilt, upbraided him with the same

\footnote{[He saved others, &c.] Nothing could be baser than this to upbraid him with this saving power, which was not a vain pretence, but had produced so many noble and stupendous effects. And it was equally unreasonable to put the credit of his mission on his coming down from the cross: a vigorous spring might possibly have forced the nails from the hands and feet of a crucified person, so that he might have leaped from the cross. What Christ had so lately done before their eyes, and in part on themselves in the garden, was a far more convincing display of a divine power than merely to have descended now could have been. And though they promise upon this to believe him, there is no room to think they would have yielded to conviction; but all they meant was to insult him by it, as thinking it impossible he should escape out of their hands. \textit{[If thou art the king of the Jews,] As}} same [reproach, and] scornfully blasphemed him as an impostor, saying, if thou art the Messiah, why dost thou not save thyself and us, who are now dying with thee? But the other, awakened to a sense of his sin, and convinced in his heart that Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah, answered his companion, and rebuked him, saying, Dost thou not fear God, even now when thou thyself art in the same condemnation? In such an awful circumstance as this, dost thou dare to increase thy crimes with thy dying breath and to behave thyself so insolently in the immediate view of God's righteous tribunal? And we indeed are justly thus condemned; for we receive no more than what is due for the notorious crimes we have committed: but this [man] has done nothing by any means amiss, nor is there the least insolence or absurdity in that high claim which he has made, though appearances be for the present so much against it. And, having thus rebuked his companion, and testified his full persuasion of the innocence of Jesus, he then directed his discourse to him, and said to Jesus, looking upon him with the humblest and the most contrite regard, Lord, though this wretch derides thy mission, I firmly believe it; and I beg that thou wouldest graciously remember me when thou comest into that thy kingdom, to which I doubt not but God will raise thee in spite of death and hell. And Jesus, turning towards him, said to him, with a mixture of the greatest dignity and mercy, Verily I say unto thee, and solemnly assure thee of it as a most certain truth, that This very day thou shalt be with me in paradise, sharing the entertainments of that garden of God, the abode of happy spirits when separate be Christ, save thyself and us. [Mat. xxvii, 44, Mark xv.—32.]

40 But the other answering, rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation?

41 And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss.

42 And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom.

43 And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.

1 When thou comest into thy kingdom.] Some have inferred from hence, that this malefactor had learnt something of Christ in prison, and have urged the possibility of his having exercised, perhaps, a long and deep repentance there, against the supposition of the sudden change that most have supposed in this case. But Christ's kingdom was now the subject of so much discourse, that he might, on that day, and indeed in a few minutes of it, have learnt all that was necessary, as the foundation of this petition. I cannot therefore but look on this happy man (for such, amidst all the ignominy and tortures of the cross, he surely was) as a glorious instance of the power as well as sovereignty of Divine grace, which (as many have observed) perhaps, taking the first occasion from the preternatural darkness, wrought so powerfully as to produce, by a sudden and astonishing growth in his last moments, all the virtues which could be crowded into so small a space, and which were evidently manifested in his confessing his own guilt, in his admonishing his companion for a crime which he feared would prove fatal to him, in his vindicating the character of Christ, and reposing his confidence in him as the Lord of a kingdom beyond the grave, when his enemies were triumphing over him, and he himself, abandoned by most of his friends, was expiring on a cross. The modesty as well as the faith of his petition may also deserve our attentive remark.

Reflections on the mercy of Christ to the penitent thief.

How great and glorious does the Lord Jesus Christ appear in the midst of all those dishonours which his enemies were now heaping upon him! While these rapacious soldiers were dividing the spoils, parting his raiment among them, and casting lots for his vesture, God was working in all to crown him with a glory which none could take from him, and to inake the lustre of it so much the more conspicuous by that dark cloud which now surrounded him.

His enemies upbraided him as an abandoned miscreant, deserted both by God and man; but he (though able to have come down from the cross in a moment, or by one word from thence to have struck these insolent wretches dead on the place, and to have sent their guilty spirits to accompany the fiends under whose influence they were), yet patiently endured all, and was as a deaf man, who heard not their reproaches, and as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth; (Psal. xxxviii. 13.) But as soon as the penitent thief addressed him with that humble supplication, the language of repentance, faith, and hope, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom, he immediately hears and answers him: and in how gracious and remarkable a phrase! This day shalt thou be with me in paradise! What a triumph was here, not only of mercy to the dying penitent, but of the strongest faith in God, that when to an eye of sense he seemed to be the most deserted and forgotten by him, and was on every side beset with the scorn of them that were at ease, and with the contempt of the proud, he should speak from the cross as from a throne, and undertake from thence, not only to dispense pardons, but to dispose of seats in paradise!

Most ungrateful and most foolish is the conduct of those who take encouragement from hence to put off their repentance perhaps to a dying moment: most ungrateful in perverting the grace of the Redeemer into an occasion of renewing their provocations against him, and hardening their hearts in their impieties, and most k Thou shalt be with me in paradise.] Bos has shewn (in his Exeget. Philol. page 49, 50) that this expression, μετ' εμοί σὺν δικαίωμα, thou shalt be with me, was the language used when inviting guests to an entertainment; and the word paradise originally signified a garden of pleasure, such as those in which the eastern monarchs made their magnificent banquets. See Raphel, Annot. cc Xeroph. p. 119.

most foolish to imagine that what our Lord did in so singular a circumstance is to be drawn into an ordinary precedent. This criminal had, perhaps, never heard of the gospel before; and now how cordially does he embrace it? Probably there are few saints in glory who ever honoured Christ more illustriously than this dying sinner, acknowledging him to be the Lord of life, whom he saw in the agonies of death; and pleading his cause when his friends and brethren forsook him, and stood afar off. (Compare Mat. xxvi. 56, and Luke xxiii. 49.)

But such is the corruption of men's hearts, and such the artifice of Satan, that all other views of him are overlooked, and nothing remembered, but that he was a notorious offender, who obtained mercy in his departing moments. The Lord grant that none who read this story here may be added to the list of those who, despising the forbearance and long-suffering of God, and not knowing that his goodness leads to repentance, have been emboldened to abuse this scripture, so as to perish, either without crying for mercy at all, or crying for it in vain, after having treasured up an inexhaustible store of wrath, misery, and despair; (Rom. ii. 4, 5.)

SECT. CXCI.

AND while he suffered all these insults and sorrows, there stood near the cross of Jesus Mary his mother, and his mother's sister, whose name continued among the disciples after our Lord's ascension, which Luke observes, Acts i. 14. Andreas Cretensis, a writer of the seventh century, does indeed tell us she died with John at Ephesus, many years after this, in an extreme old age; and it appears, from a letter of the council of Ephesus, in the fifth century, that it was then believed she was buried there. But they pretend to show her sepulchre at Jerusalem, and many ridiculous tales are forged concerning her death, and assumption, or being taken up into heaven, of which the best Popish authors themselves appear heartily ashamed. See Cabinet's Dictionary, Vol. II. p. 141.
26 When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son.

27 Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother. And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home.

Mar. XXVII. 45.
Now (Luke, it was about the sixth hour and) from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto,

b His mother's sister, Mary [the wife] of Cleopas.] It is not determined in the original whether she was the wife, or mother, or daughter, of Cleopas; but critics generally suppose she was his wife; and that he also was called Alpheus, and was the father, as this Mary was the mother, of James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Judas, who are therefore called our Lord's brethren or kinsmen. (Mat. xiii. 55.) See note e on John xiv. 22, p. 309.—Grotius indeed thinks that Cleopas was her father, and Alpheus her husband. After all, we cannot certainly determine it; but, like most other undeterminable points, it is a matter of no great importance. I know none who has set it in a plainer and juster light than Dr. Edwards Exercit. part ii. No. 1, p. 163, & seq.

c Said to his mother, Woman.] We have observed elsewhere that Joseph probably was dead some time before (compare note a on John vi. 1. Vol. I. p. 131, and note a on John vi. 42, Vol. I. p. 430); and as Jesus now showed the tender concern he had for his mother in committing her to the care of John, so this concern that he expressed for her support must have affected her no less than if he had called her mother; which some have thought he might not choose to do, to avoid exposing her to the abuses of the populace, by a discovery of her near relation to him. But woman was a title he before had used in speaking to his mother where no such caution was necessary; and it was frequently applied in ancient times, even to persons that were the most respected. See note d on John ii. 4, Vol. I. p. 132.

d Behold thy Son.] Some have explained these words as if they only signified, "Behold a person who will carry it to thee as thy son, and will take care of thee." But as the tenderness of Jesus for his mother, is expressed in the next verse, in the direction that he gives to John to treat her as his mother, it seems more natural to understand this former exhortation as expressive of his kindness for John, and so take it as a direction given to his mother to regard him as her son with all the affection of a tender parent.
Jesus cries out of God's forsaking him.

46 And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani? that is, being interpreted, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? [Mark xv. 34.]

There was darkness over the whole land. There are so many places in which ẓom signifies a particular country, and not the whole earth, that I have chosen here to follow our translation; and the rather, because the farther we suppose this darkness to extend, the more unaccountable it is, that no Heathen writers should have mentioned it except Pellacon; if he is indeed to be excepted. A darkness over the whole earth at once must have been preternatural at any time; and it is morally impossible that a multitude of accounts of it should not, even by a tradition of many hundred years, have been transmitted to posterity. What is said of the Chinese chronicles mentioning it, must be very uncertain; and as of Josephus, his omission of it, I think Dr. More with reason accounts for it, by his unwillingness to mention a fact which had so favourable an aspect on Christianity: and the Jews would, no doubt, disguise it as much as they could, and perhaps might persuade him, and others, who heard the report of it at some distance of time or place, that it was only a dark cloud or a thick mist, which the followers of Jesus had exaggerated, because it happened when their Master died. Such representations are exceeding natural to hearts corrupted by infidelity.

As it was now full moon Mr. Shuckford, in his preface to the third volume of his excellent Conjunction of the Sacred and Profane History of the World, has advanced some important considerations to prove, that it is at least very uncertain whether the Jewish months, according to the Mosaic institution, began with a new moon, and consequently whether their passover, which was fixed to the fourteenth day of the first month, must always happen at full moon. But he allows that, towards the decline of their state, it did. And indeed Josephus, who, being a Jewish priest, is an unexceptionable witness in this case, seems to put it beyond all possibility of doubt; expressly asserting, that the day of expiation, and consequently their other feasts, were reckoned by the age of the moon. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 10, § 3. בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר הַפַּרְצָא בֵּאָר H. C.)

Dr. Edwards thinks our Lord in his agony repeated the words twice with some little variation, saying at one time, Eloi, and at the other Eli. This is possible; and if it were otherwise, I doubt not but Mark has given us the word exactly, and Matthew a kind of contraction of it. See Edwards's Excret., p. 193—195.
The Jews pretend that he was calling for Elijah.

John XIX. 28. After this, Jesus knowing that all the grievous and terrible things he had to suffer in the way to death, were now upon the point of being perfectly accomplished, and finding himself parched with a violent drought, as the consequence of what he had so long endured both in mind and body that the scripture might be fulfilled (Psal. xxii. 15, and lxix.

b Why hast thou forsaken me? The pious and judicious Lord Chief Justice Hale has a strange reflection on these words; "We may (says he) with reverence conceive, that at the time of this bitter cup, the soul of our blessed Redeemer was for the present overshadowed with so much astonishment and sorrow, as to overpower and cover the distinct sense of the reason of his sufferings, at least in some measure and degree." Hale's Contemplations, Vol. I. p. 72) But the sense given in the paraphrase is much more natural. Thus in a most humble and affectionate manner he reminds his heavenly Father, that he was only by imputation a sinner, and had himself done nothing to incur his displeasure,—I choose not, with Dr. Moore (in his Theological Works, p. 291), to render it How far, or to what degree, hast thou forsaken me! because though this would be a just version of ἑλθέναι, the Greek word ἐλθέναι, which answers to it in Matthew, is not liable to such ambiguity.—I conclude with adding, that this interruption of a joyful sense of his Father's presence (though there was, and could not but be, a rational apprehension of his constant favour, and high approbation of what he was now doing), was as necessary as it was that Christ should suffer at all. For had God communicated to his Son on the cross those strong consolations which he has given to some of the martyrs in their tortures, all sense of pain, and consequently all real pain, would have been swallowed up; and the violence done to his body, not affecting the soul, could not properly have been called suffering.

n And some of them that stood by, &c.) Whether this was, as Dr. Edwards (Exercit. p. 196—203), and Mr. Bradock (Harm. part ii. p. 256), suppose the mistake of some Hellenist Jews, who did not understand the Syro-Chaldaic language; or whether it proceeded from his being raised so high, that, amidst the rude noise around him, they did not distinctly hear; I do not pretend to say. Perhaps the malice of those who did hear what he said, might misrepresent his words, to prevent any serious reflections on the psalm from which they were taken, and to expose him to farther contempt.

John XIX. 29

Now there was set, as usual on such occasions, a vessel full of vinegar near the cross; and immediately upon his mentioning his thirst, one of them ran, and took a sponge, and filled [it] with this vinegar; and putting it round [a stalk of] hyssop, which they had fastened on the top of a kind of cane, or large reed, they put it up to his mouth, and in a contemptuous manner gave it to drink. But the rest of them that stood by said, Let [him] alone, and let us see whether Elijah, whom he has just been calling upon, will come and save him from the cross; [and] indeed he must take him down quickly, if at all. So little were their hearts affected with this preternatural darkness, which had continued now three hours; and thus cruelly did they insult him, even in his expiring moments, which had been most inhuman, though he had really been the vilest malefactor.

When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, and thus had perfectly fulfilled the prophecies relating to his sufferings, he said, It is finished: the important work, for which I came into the world, is now completed, the demands of the law are satisfied, the justice of God is atoned, and my sufferings are now at an end. And crying out again with a great and strong voice, which plainly shewed that much of the strength of nature was yet in him; he said, with a lively faith and holy joy, Father, for so I will still call thee, though that claim is thus derided by mine enemies, I am now coming to thee, and into thy hands I commit my departing Spirit, depositing it with thee as a sacred trust, which I am confident thou wilt receive and keep. And when he had said thus, declining his head, he voluntarily dismissed or delivered up his Spirit, and expired.

A vessel full of vinegar.] It is well known that vinegar and water (which mixture was called posca) was the common drink of the Roman soldiers: perhaps therefore the vinegar was set here for their use, or for that of the crucified persons, whose torture would naturally make them thirsty.

He dismissed or delivered up his Spirit and expired.] The Evangelists use different words in expressing our Lord's death, which I a little wonder that our translators render in
And behold, God by a very awful and miraculous interposition, avowed the relation which his Son claimed, and evidently appeared to take the charge of that dear and excellent Spirit which Jesus so solemnly recommended to him: for immediately upon his death, [while] the sun was still darkened, as was observed before (ver. 45), the veil of the temple, which separated between the holy and the most holy place, though made of the richest and strongest tapestry, was miraculously rent in twain in two in the midst, from the top to the very bottom; so that while the priest was ministering at the golden altar, it being the time of evening sacrifice, the sacred oracle was laid open to full view: God thereby declaring, as it were, the abolition of the whole Mosaic ritual, which depended on a distinction between those two parts of the temple; and intimating that a passage was opened into the most holy place by the blood of Jesus, which was now poured out on mount Calvary, And at the same time, to increase the terror, the earth trembled even to the very spot of ground on which the temple stood, and several of the rocks in the neighbouring parts were torn asunder; And some in the same manner, he yielded, or gave up the ghost. Mark and Luke say εξεστησεν he expired; John, επέσπευσεν he yielded up his Spirit; but Matthew's language is yet more singular σπευσα he dismissed his Spirit (as the same word επέσπευσεν is used, Mat. xiii. 36. Mark iv. 50. xi. 6, and elsewhere). Now this expression seems admirably to suit our Lord's words, John x. 18. No man taketh my life from me, but I lay it down of myself, &c. (see the paraphrase and note there, p. 86), shewing, as the strong cry which so much impressed the evolution did, that he died by the voluntary act of his own mind, according to the power received from the Father, and in a way peculiar to himself, by which he alone, of all men that ever existed, could have continued alive even in the greatest tortures, as long as he pleased, or retired from the body whenever he thought fit. Which view of the case, by the way, suggests an illustration of the love of Christ manifested in his death, beyond what is commonly observed; inasmuch as he did not use this power to quit his body, as soon as ever it was fastened to the cross, leaving only an insensible corpse to the cruelty of his murderers, but continued his abode in it, with a steady resolution, as long as it was proper; and then retired from it with a majesty and dignity never known, or to be known, in any other death; dying, if I may so express it, like the Prince of life.

While the priest was ministering at the golden altar, &c.] This being so high a day, it is probable that Caiaphas himself might now be performing the solemn act of burning incense just before the veil; which if he did, it is inexpressibly astonishing that his obdurate heart should not be impressed with so awful and significant a phenomenon. There is no room to doubt, but many of the other priests, who had a hand in Christ's death, saw the pieces of the veil; which, considering its texture, and the other circumstances, must as fully convince them of the reality of this extraordinary fact as if they had actually been present when it was rent.

The rocks were torn asunder.] Mr. Fleming tells us (in his Christology, Vol. II. p. 97, 98), that a deist lately travelling through Palestine was converted, by viewing one of these rocks, which still remains torn asunder, not in the weakest place, but cross the veins; a plain proof that it was done in a supernatural manner.—Sandys, in his excellent Travels, p. 164, has given an accurate description and delineation of this fixture; and Mr. Maundrell in his some of the tombs there were opened by the earth-quake: and, which was much more astonishing, a little while after, while the monuments continued unclosed, many bodies of those holy men who were sleeping there were raised from the dust of death. And came out of the tombs after the resurrection of [Jesus], and entered into Jerusalem, the holy city, and appeared unto many; attesting the truth of that important fact, and declaring their own rescue from the grave, as a kind of first fruits of his power over death, which should at length accomplish a general resurrection.

And when the Roman centurion, who stood over-against him, and guarded the execution, saw that he so cried out with such strength of voice, and such firm confidence in God, even at the moment when he expired; [and] also saw what was [then] done in so miraculous a manner, in those amazing prodigies that attended his death; he glorified God by a free confession of his persuasion of the innocence of Jesus, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man; [yea, notwithstanding all the vile reproaches which have been opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept, arose, were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept, arose.

Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 73, 74, tells us, that it is about a span wide at the upper part, and two spans deep; after which it closes, but opens again below (as may be seen in another place below contiguous to the site of Calvary,) and runs down to an unknown depth in the earth. He adds, that every man's sense and reason must convince him that this is a natural and genuine breach.

Many bodies of holy men were raised.) That ingenious writer Mr. Fleming, who abounds with a vast number of peculiar conjectures, thinks that these were some of the most eminent saints mentioned in the Old Testament; and that they appeared in some extraordinary splendour, and were known by revelation, as Eve's original and relation was to Adam, or Moses and Elijah to the disciples at the transfiguration. He ventures particularly to conjecture who they were; but does not mention David among them. (Fleming of the First Resurrection, p. 29–38. But Mr. Pierce (on Colos. p. 68) maintains, that it is very improbable that, had other saints of former ages risen, David should have been excluded; and since Acts ii. 34, proves that he did not now rise, he concludes, that the saints who rose were some who died but a little before, perhaps such as had believed in Christ, and were well known to surviving disciples. It was to be sure a most surprising event, and Dr. Whitby supposes, John v. 25, was a prophecy relating to it.)

And came out of the tombs after the resurrection of Jesus, &c. Consequently it seems that the tombs stood open all the sabbath, when the law would not allow any attempt to close them. What an astonishing spectacle! especially if their resurrection was not instantaneously accomplished, but by such slow degrees, as that represented in Ezekiel's vision: Ezek. xxxvii.) Yet I do not take upon me to say that it was so; for it is unprofitable too particularly to conjecture on such circumstances which are not recorded. For this reason also I pretend not to say what became of these persons; though, as one can hardly imagine they either immediately returned to their graves, or that they continued to live on earth (because it is only said, they appeared to them,) it seems most natural to imagine they are not intended here with, or after, our Lord: perhaps from some solitude, to which they might be directed to retire during the intermediate days, and to wait in devout exercises for their change, for surely, had they ascended in the view of others, the memory of such a fact could not have been lost.
The terrified spectators are convinced he is the Son of God.

was the Son of God. [Mat. xxvii. 54.—Luke xxiii. 47.]

And they that were with him, watching Jesus, saw the earthquake, and terrors that were done, and they feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God.

Luke xxiii. 48. And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts and returned.

have been cast upon him; truly this man was what he declared himself to be, even the Son of God himself. And the soldiers also that attended the centurion, even they that were with him guarding Jesus on the cross, seeing the earthquake and those other things which were now done, feared greatly, and said in like manner, Truly this Jesus of Nazareth, whom we have been thus insulting and murdering, was the Son of God; and his heavenly Father will certainly avenge his quarrel very terribly on us, and on the whole nation of the Jews, who have delivered him to us.

And all the multitude that were come together on this remarkable occasion, to see this doleful spectacle even some of those who but a little before had been insulting him in his dying agonies, when they saw the things which were done, returned, beating their breasts for sorrow and remorse; in terrible expectation that some sad calamity would speedily befall them and their country, for the indignities and cruelties they had offered to a person for whom God had expressed so high a regard, even in his greatest distress.

IMPROVEMENT.

And surely we, when we return from such a view of it as this, have reason to smite upon our breasts too, and to be most deeply affected with what we have heard and seen in this lively description.

Certainly this was a righteous man; 8c. The most learned Mr. Warne of Aynho (whose death since the publication of my first volume is an irreparable loss to the commonwealth of letters) has a dissertation on these words of the centurion; in the first number of the Bibliotheca Literaria, to which I am indebted for several hints in the paraphrase on these verses; but I have ventured to depart from him, in not entirely incorporating Mat. xxvii. 54. with Mark xv. 52. and Luke xxiii. 47. as the latter only mention the effect of this surprising sight on the centurion, while Matthew gives us also an account of the effect it had upon the soldiers, who very probably might repeat the words, their officer had spoke but just before, in expressing their sentiments on this occasion. I shall only add, that Elsner, in a very learned note on this place, has shewn that some of the Hebrews had a notion among them, that prodigies, especially storms and earthquakes, sometimes attended the death of extraordinary persons; peculiarly dear to the gods, and among other passages, mentions that of Pharaoh, in which he tells us, that when Ptolemy had crucified Cleomenes, while the body hung dead on the cross, a large serpent wound itself round his face; and defended it from birds of prey; from whence the Egyptians concluded he was a hero more than mortal, and a son of the gods. See Elsner. Observ. Vol. i. p. 126, 127.

All the multitude; That is, great multitudes; for it is no way necessary to suppose that every individual person present was thus impressed. The conviction, produced by these prodigies undoubtedly made way for the conversion of such a multitude by the preaching of the apostles, on the descent of the Spirit, which was but seven weeks after, when these things were fresh in their memories. Acts ii. 41.
tion. Let us set ourselves as with the mother of Jesus, and the beloved disciple, at the foot of the cross: and see whether there be any sorrow like unto his sorrow, wherewith the Lord afflicted him in the day of his fierce anger, (Lam. i. 12.) Well might the sun grow pale at the sight; well might the earth tremble to support it! How obdurate must the hearts of those sinners be, who could make a mock of all his anguish, and sport themselves with his dying groans! But surely the blessed angels who were now, though in an invisible crowd, surrounding the accursed tree, beheld him with other sentiments: adoring and adoring the various virtues which he expressed in every circumstance of his behaviour; and which, while the sun of righteousness was setting, gilded John xix. 25, 26 and adorned all the horizon. Let us likewise pay our homage to 23—30 them, and observe with admiration his tenderness to his surviving parent; his meekness under all these injuries and provocations; his steady faith in God in an hour of the utmost distress; and his concern to accomplish all the purposes of his life, before he yielded to the stroke of death.

Yet with what amazement must the holy angels hear that cry from the Son of God, from the darling of heaven, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me! Let not any of the children of God wonder if their heavenly Father sometimes withdraw from them the sensible and supporting manifestations of his presence, when Christ himself was thus exercised; and let them remember that faith never appears with greater glory than when, in language like this, it bursts through a thick cloud, and owns, the God of Israel, and the Saviour, even while he is a God that hideth himself from us, (Is. xlv. 15.) May we, in our approaching combat with the king of terrors, find him enervated by the death of our dear Lord, who thus conquered even when he fell! May we thus breathe out our willing and composed spirits into our Father's hands, with a language and faith like this, as knowing whom we have believed, and being persuaded that he is able to keep what we commit to him until that day! (2 Tim. i. 12.)

With pleasure may we survey the awful tokens by which God owned his dying Son, and wiped away the infamy of his cross. The veil is now rent by the death of Jesus; let us be encouraged to come boldly to the throne of grace, and to draw near to the holiest of all, into which he has entered with his own blood, (Heb. iv. 16. ix. 12.) May God render the knowledge of the cross of Christ, the blessed means of shaking the consciences of men with powerful convictions, and of raising them from the death of sin to a life of holiness! And may we be so planted together in the likeness of his death, that we may at length also be planted in the likeness of his resurrection! (Rom. vi. 5)
SECT. CXCII.

While Christ continues hanging on the cross, his side is pierced, but his legs are not broken: Joseph begs the corpse, and lays it with respect in his own sepulchre. Mat. XXVII. 35—61. Mark XV. 40, to the end. Luke XXIII. 49, to the end. John XIX. 31, to the end.

LUKE XXIII. 49.

AND all his acquaintance, and [many] women, [war], who, when he was in Galilee, followed him and ministered unto him,] [and followed him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things. [Mat. xxvii. 55. Mark xv. 40, 41.

LUKE XXIII. 49.

AND while our Lord was thus expiring on the cross, all his familiar acquaintance mingled themselves with the crowd of spectators, and stood at a distance viewing these things with weeping eyes and sympathizing hearts: and of this number there were many pious women, who had attended him when he was in Galilee, and had there ministered to him, and liberally assisted him and his disciples with their substance; compare Luke viii. 2, 3. Vol. I. p. 319, 320.) [and] had now followed him from Galilee to Jerusalem, where they had constantly attended on his preaching in the temple, nor would they leave him in this great and last trial: Among whom there was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less and of Joses; and there was also the mother of the apostles James and John, whom we have so often mentioned as the sons of Zebedee the fisherman; and Salome also, and many other zealous

Mat. XXVII. 56.—Among which was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James [the less] and [of] Joses, and the mother

b And the mother of the sons of Zebedee. Though the construction of the original be dubious, yet I think it very rational to conclude that this mother of the sons of Zebedee, or of James the greater and John, was a different person from the mother of James the less and Joses; both as the sons of Zebedee, though such distinguished friends of Christ are never called his brethren, as James and Joses are, (Mat. xiii. 55. and Mark vi. 3. Vol. I. p. 385,) and as some scriptures plainly intimate that no more than two of the apostles were the sons of Zebedee.—(See Mat. x. 2. xxvi. 37. Mark iii. 17.)

c And Salome.] This Salome, who is mentioned here by Mark, is commonly supposed to be the mother of Zebedee's children mentioned by Matthew: but as it is expressly said there were many other women present, she might possibly be some other disciple.
zealous and affectionate women, who came up with him to this passover at Jerusalem, and who had the courage to attend him, even when his apostles themselves had forsaken him and fled.

Then, as the day was drawing to a close, the Jews were very solicitous, because it was now the preparation for the sabbath, that the bodies might not remain all night upon the cross, which their law expressly forbade, (Deut. xxi. 22, 23.) and more especially they were concerned that this profanation might not happen on the sabbath-day, (for that sabbath, being the first which followed the passover, was a great day of peculiar solemnity:) they went therefore and entreated Pilate that he would send an order to the soldiers, who were watching the crucified persons, that their legs might be broken, the more effectually to dispatch them, if they were not quite dead, and (that) they might then be taken away. And Pilate upon this gave orders that it should accordingly be done: the soldiers therefore who guarded the execution, came and brake the legs of the first malefactor, or of him that hung nearest the place where they had been sitting; and then passing by Jesus, who hung in the middle, they went and brake the legs of the other who was crucified with him. But coming afterwards to Jesus, they did not break his legs, as they saw it was needless since it was plain he was already dead: and they were now impressed with some degree of reverence even to his corpse, by the amazing prodigies which they had just now seen. But yet one of the soldiers had so much boldness and inhumanity, that he pierced his side with a long lance or spear, which he had in his hand; and immediately there came out of the wound both blood and water mingled with it which made it plainly appear that had mother of Zebedee's children, (and Salome, and many other women, which came up with him unto Jerusalem.) [Mark xv. 40, 41.]

John xix. 31. The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the sabbath-day, (for that sabbath-day was an high-day,) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away.

Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him.

But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs.

But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water.

...[For that sabbath was a great day.] It was (as Dr. Whitby in his paraphrase has well observed) not only a sabbath, but the second day of the feast of unleavened bread, from whence they reckoned the weeks to pentecost; and also the day for presenting and offering the sheaf of new corn: so that it was indeed a treble solemnity.—See note b on Luke vi. i. Vol. I. p. 267.

...[ Might be taken away.] It was customary, as Bishop Pearson, (on the Creed, p. 218.) has abundantly proved, to let the bodies of persons who had been executed continue on the crosses or stakes till they were eaten up by birds of prey: but as this was forbidden to the Jews, the Roman governors probably used to oblige them by permitting such bodies as belonged to them to be buried.

...[There came out blood and water.] I do not pretend to determine whether this was as Dr. Drake supposes (in his Anatomy, Vol. I. p. 106.) the small quantity of water infused in the pericardium, in which the heart swims, or whether the crurx was now...
These things were done that the scripture might be fulfilled.

35 And be that saw it, bare record, and his record is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe.

And as this was so important, and indeed so fundamental a point, it may not be improper to add, that it was one who saw [it] who has borne [this] testimony, and recorded so remarkable a circumstance; and therefore his witness is undoubtedly true: and now he is writing this he solemnly declares that he knows, by the most certain testimony of his senses, that what he saith is true; and he makes this declaration that you, whoever you are, into whose hands this history may come sooner or later, may believe, and may be confirmed in your adherence to that gospel which is established on the death and resurrection of Christ.

For, however inconsiderable these things may appear, they were permitted in the course of Divine Providence to be done, that thus the scripture might be remarkably fulfilled, in what it says concerning the paschal lamb, which did in so many circumstances resemble Christ (Exod. xii. 46, and Num. ix. 12.) "Not a bone of it shall be broken"; a precept which, among many others, was given on purpose to lead the minds of believers to reflect on the harmony and unity of design carried on (though by such a variety of persons, in no concert with each other) under the Old Testament and under the New. And again, there is another scripture, which says, concerning the Jews, when they are to be converted to the Messiah in the latter days, "They shall look on him whom they have pierced," (Zech. xii. 10.) for which reason now almost coagulated, and separated from the serum; either way, it was a certain proof of Christ's death; for he could not have survived such a wound had it been given him in perfect health.

So important and fundamental a point.] The grand evidence of Christ's mission in his resurrection, which implies the certainty of his death: and this crucifixion might have seemed, on a slight view, a less proper execution than some others, such as beheading, stoning, and the like; but this wound would effectually exclude all pretences of his having been taken down alive by his friends; and accordingly that is an evasion which, false and malicious as his enemies were, we do not find they ever had recourse to.

h Not a bone of it shall be broken.] Dr. Arthur Young, in his Historical Dissertation on Revelation designed to prevent Superstition, Vol. I. p. 196, 203, 204, has a particular thought on the reason of this prohibition, that it was intended to oppose the manner in which the Egyptian sacrifices were sometimes pulled to pieces: but I think the reason suggested in the paraphrase much more certain and important. It is very well illustrated in An Essay on the several Dispensations of God, &c. Pref. p. xxii. 8. reg.
Joseph goes to Pilate and begs the body of Jesus.

reason God permitted them not only to pierce the hands and the feet of Jesus with nails, but also to open his side by that deep and large wound which we have now been mentioning.

And quickly after these things, as it was near sun-set, and the evening was now come, because (as we have observed) it was the preparation, or the close of the day before the sabbath (John xix. 31.) for it was Friday evening, and the sabbath, which would begin at six o'clock, was near at hand, in which no work could lawfully be done; Behold, there came to the governor's palace a certain rich man of Arimathae (a city of the Jews, anciently called Ramoth, which lay in the tribe of Ephraim, and was the city of Samuel, that celebrated prophet), and he was named Joseph, and was a person of con siderable note, being an honourable counsellor, or member of the sanhedrin, who had a general reputation as a benevolent and upright man.
The same was not concerned with the rest of his fellow-senators in putting Jesus to death, and had not given the concurrence of his vote to the counsel and action of them that condemned him;
[but was one] who also himself humbly and affectionately waited for the kingdom of God, being indeed a disciple of Jesus, though secretly; be cause he durst not openly profess his belief in him for fear of the Jews and their rulers, who were so strongly prejudiced against him. This man, awakened by the prodigies attending his death to greater courage than he had before, though he knew it must necessarily draw upon him the hatred and contempt of his brethren, yet went in boldly to the presence of Pilate, and b egged his permission that he might take away the body of Jesus, to preserve it from further insults, and bury it in a decent and respectful manner.

And when Pilate heard his request, consider ing how lingering an execution tial of the cross was, he thought it strange if he were already dead, and would not easily believe it; and therefore, having called the centurion to him, who was ap pointed to guard the bodies, he asked him whe ther he had been dead any time. And when he

And now [John, after this] when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath; [Mat. xxvii. 57.—John xix. 38.]

Behold, [there came a rich man of Arimathae,] [Luke, a city of the Jews,] named Jo seph, [Mark, an ho nourable counsellor,] and he was a good man, and a just; [Mat.
xxvii.—57.—Mark xv. 43. Luke xxiii.—31.—]—51 The same had not consorted to the counsel and deed of them; [but was one] who also himself waited for the kingdom of God,[John, being a dis ciple of Jesus, but secret ly, for fear of the Jews.] [Mat. xxvii.—57. Mark xv. —43.—John xix.—38.—]

This man went [Mark, in boldly] un to Pilate, and begged [John, that he might take away the body of Jesus.] [Mat. xxvii. 58.—Mark xv. —43. John xix.—38.—]

And when he knew

Went in boldly to Pilate.] It was indeed a courageous act for this rich and noble senator thus publicly to own his friendship to Jesus in the midst of his greatest in famy; and a person of such sagacity could not but know that, if a resurrection should happen, nothing would have been more natural than that he should have been brought into question as a confederate in the pretended fraud of conveying him away. . . .
knew it of the centurion; [John, Pilate gave him leave;] [and commanded the body to be delivered] to Joseph. [Mat. xxvii.—John xix.—38.—]

46—And [Joseph] bought fine linen, and [John, came therefore and] took down [John, the body of Jesus,] and wrapped [it in a clean linen cloth.] [Mat. xxvii. 59. Luke xxvii. 53.—John xix.—38.]

John XIX. 59. And there came also Nicodemus, (which at the first came to Jesus by night,) and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight.

40 Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes, with the spices as the manner of the Jews is to bury.

41—Now in the place where he was crucified, there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre.

42 There laid they Jesus therefore [in Joseph's own new tomb, which he had hewn;] [Luke, in stone;]

[Mark xvi. 10]

k Swathed it up in linen.] This I take to be the most literal translation of the words ἐδέσατο ἐν περασί; for σταυρός were a kind of linen rollers, in which, as Elmer has shewn of Observ. Vol. I. p. 347.) the easterns swathed up their dead. It was, no doubt, by miracle, that when Christ arose he disentangled himself from these swathes.

out of a solid rock; to which therefore there could be no passage but by the door, and in which no man was ever yet laid; so that there could be no room to imagine any other person rose from thence. And this they did without first carrying the body into any house to embalm it; because (as we have said before) it was the Jewish preparation day, and the sabbath drew on, which did not allow their undertaking a work of so much labour and time: to be ready therefore for the rest commanded on the sabbath-day, they used no farther ceremony in interring him, and chose a most convenient place to do it, with dispatch, for the sepulchre was very near at hand.

And Joseph having thus interred him in his own tomb, and so (as it was prophesied concerning the Messiah, Isa. liii. 9.) “made his grave with the rich in his death,” he took care to make all things secure, and having rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, to block up the entrance, he went away to his own home.

And when Joseph and Nicodemus came, and took down Jesus from the cross, Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, who (as was said before) was the mother of James the less and Joses (Mat. xxvii. 56, p. 421.) and the rest of the women also who came with him from Galilee, and so affectionately attended during the time of his crucifixion, were now desirous to see how they disposed of him; and therefore when they carried off the corpse, these pious women followed after them, and sitting over against the sepulchre, into which they saw them enter, beheld with diligent observation where and how his body was laid. And perceiving that they did not embalm him, but only wound him up in linen with the dry spices, they resolved to perform this last office of duty and affection to him

1 Made his grave with the rich in his death.] Let me here be permitted to mention the criticism of a celebrated divine on this passage of Isaiah, which having never (that I know of) been published, may be now to many, as it was to me, Observing that the word רחש may be the dual number, and that רחש is the singular, he would suppose a kind of headinis in the construction, and render it, His death and burial shall be with two criminals, and with one rich man; that is, after having expired between two nailed factors, a rich man (that is, Joseph of Arimathæa) shall undertake the care of his funeral.—But I must acknowledge that no version of the words pleases me so well on the whole as that of Dr. Sykes, which I read since I wrote the paraphrase above.

II Nevertheless he shall avenge or recompense his grave upon the wicked, and his death upon the rich: or, which is equivalent to the former, but perhaps more exact, He shall avenge his grave (that is, his death which brings him down to it) on the wicked, and on the rich when he dies... See Dr. Sykes on the Truth of Christianity, p. 356.
and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the sabbath day according to the commandment.

in the completest and most respectful manner they could; and therefore they immediately returned into the city, and before the day of preparation was quite finished, they provided a great quantity of spices and balsams for that purpose, that nothing might prevent them from engaging in it as soon as the first day of the week should open; and, in the mean time, they rested on the sabbath-day, according to the Divine commandment, which they would not violate even on so solemn an occasion as this.

IMPROVEMENT.

We have seen the sorrows of our expiring Lord: let us now, like these pious women, raise our eyes to him with an holy and unfeigned affection, and behold him pale and breathless on the accursed tree. Let us view him by faith, till the eye affects the heart, and till we learn to glory in nothing but his cross, whereby the world may be crucified to us, and we may be crucified to the world. (Gal. vi. 14.)

How wonderfully does the providence of God appear to have regarded the body of Jesus, which had so long been the temple of the indwelling Deity; even when it was deserted of that Spirit which had lately animated it; and while it hung (amazing thought, that it ever should have hung!) between the bodies of two thieves on a cross, without the gates of Jerusalem! He, who has all hearts in his hand, interposed by a secret but powerful influence on the soldiers, who brake the legs of the malefactors, to spare those of Christ; that so nothing which looked like a prophecy of him should want its proper accomplishment. But his side was pierced; and how deep was the wound, when immediately there came out of it blood and water! Happy emblem of the blessed effect of his death! He came both by water and blood (as he who saw and testified this important fact leads us to improve it, 1 John v. 6.); and by this means at once atones the injured justice of God, and purifies the souls of them that believe in him.

Our indignation rises against the man that could, by such an outrage as this, abuse the dead body of our Redeemer: but oh, let us seriously remember the hand which our sins had in all that was now done. He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities: (Isa. liii. 5.) And therefore it is said concerning those on whom the ends of the world are to come, that they shall look on him whom they have pierced, and mourn; (Zech. xii. 10.) May we mourn over him with a genuine evangelical sorrow, when we consider whom we have pierced; and how deep and how often we have pierced him; and upon what slight temptations;
Judas repents when Jesus is condemned.

Mark xv. 46.
John xix. 40.

HAVING thus finished the account of the death of Jesus, it may be convenient here to mention the miserable end of that perfidious disciple by whom he was betrayed into the hands of his enemies. The Jewish rulers having delivered Jesus to the Roman governor, and having prevailed upon him to give orders for his execution, then Judas, who had betrayed him, when he saw to his surprise that he was condemned by Pilate, and that they were leading him forth to die upon the cross, to which he seemed determined to submit, though he could so easily have rescued himself from it, was seized with great terror.

1 Then Judas, &c.] For the proper place of this story, which is here inserted out of its order, see note on John xix. 16, p. 490.

Matthew has introduced it immediately after the Jews had delivered Jesus to Pilate; but after this the Jews were so intent on per-brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and terror and agony of conscience; and repenting of the fatal bargain he had made, whereby he had brought such a load of guilt on his own soul, he carried back the thirty pieces of silver which they had given him, to the chief priests and the elders, while they were together in the temple that morning; for they resorted thither with a specious appearance of piety, before they followed the multitude to Calvary to see the execution. And coming in among them in a wild disorder, he said to them, Oh Sirs! I have sinned in a most desperate manner, in that I have betrayed innocent blood to you; for I am well convinced, that Jesus my Master has done nothing to deserve this punishment to which you have delivered him; and I am not able to bear the thought of the concern I have had in it. And they answered with the steady coldness of those who knew no shame or remorse for their wickedness, What is that to us, whether thou thinkest him innocent or not? See thou [to that]; it is sufficient for us that we know he is guilty, whether such a wretch as thou art approvest or condemnest our sentence. And throwing down the pieces of silver money in the temple, in their very presence, with all the marks of agony and distress, he withdrew; and going away to the brow of a hill, in some retired and melancholy place, he there hanged himself; but the rope breaking by the force with which he threw himself off, he fell down the precipice, and burst asunder with the force of his fall, so that all his bowels gushed out; and he lay expiring

b And going away, he hanged himself; but the rope breaking, &c. This method which Mr. Le Clerc, (Harm. p. 527) and several other learned critics, have taken, of reconciling Matthew with what is afterwards said of this fact (Acts i. 18). that falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out) appears to me much preferable to that of those who would render amyx̂o, he was stifled, or suffocated, with excess of grief (see La Motte of Inspir. p. 155); a version, which none of the authorities I have seen seem sufficient to justify. Nor is it necessary to suppose with Dr. Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. on Mat. xxvii. 5, and Acts i. 18), that Judas was carried away by the devil, and strangled in the air, and being thrown from thence in the sight of all the city, was dashed in pieces by the violence of the fall.

The potters field is purchased with the money,

And the chief priests, taking up the pieces of silver, were at some loss how they should dispose of them; for they said, It is not lawful for us to put them into the chest which is called Corban, or the sacred treasury, because it is the price of blood, and would in effect be offering to God the life of a man. And these hypocrites scrupled such a point of ceremony, while they still persisted in their resolution to destroy Jesus, which, if they had desired it, they might yet have prevented. But afterwards, when they met in a body about some other business, having consulted together what they should do with those pieces of money, they bought with them that close in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, which is called The potters field: for a burying-place of foreigners who had no sepulchres of their own, and whose bodies they scrupled to lay with those of their own holy nation. And therefore, by the way, that field was called, in the Syriac language, Acedama, that is, The field of blood (Acts i. 19); and it bears that name even to this day, because it was purchased with that money which was the price paid for the blood of Jesus, and was in effect the purchase of the blood of Judas too.

Then was that fulfilled in a very remarkable manner, which was spoken by the prophet, (Zech. 6:6 And the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood,

7 And they took counsel, and bought with them the potters field, to bury strangers in.

8 Wherefore that field was called, the field of blood, unto this day.

9 (Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, Mede's reasonings (see his Works, p. 963), that these words, though recorded by Zechariah, or rather found in his book, were originally spoken by Jeremiah, and by some accident displaced: a principle on which the whole credit of the prophecies might be destroyed. It would be a much less dishonour to the sacred writings, to suppose a small error in the pen of some early transcriber, who might (as Bishop Hall pretty conjectures), by the mistake of one letter only (supposing the word to be contracted), write Jer. for Zeph. And though it is certain that Jeremiah was the received reading, as early as Origen's time, yet there is room to doubt whether any prophet was named in the first copies, as the Syriack version, which is allowed to be made in the most early times, says only, It was spoken by the prophet, without mentioning by whom. On the whole, I think it more respectful to the evangelist to
And thus what Zechariah said was fulfilled. (Zech. xi. 13), saying, "And I took the thirty pieces of silver" (which sum, the reader will observe, was the usual price of one who was sold for a slave, or of one whom the children of Israel did sell, being esteemed among them on an average but the equitable price of such a one; and was here the price of the blood of the Son of God himself, that infinitely valuable Person): "And they were given for the potters' field, as (saith the prophet) the Lord commanded me in vision, in token of his just displeasure against those who had put such an affront on his pastoral care."

But to return now to the main story. When, notwithstanding xxvi. 26.

MAT. XXVII. 62. Now to suppose that some officious transcriber might either insert or change the prophet's name, than to impute it, as Dr. Mill seems to do, to a slip in the author's memory.

"The price of one who was sold, &c." We may either render the words, [την ἐκμοισθήσειν, καὶ τιμασθάντα αὐτῷ Αραβάν], of one that was sold, even of one whom the children of Israel did sell; and so consider them as expressive of the common price a slave was rated at among them; or we may render them, of him that was sold, or valued (even their own Messiah) whom the very children of Israel sold at this shameful price. And I think, either of these versions would suit the original, and convey a lively and proper sense: I have therefore suggested both in the paraphrase, though in the version, which could not well be equally ambiguous, I have preferred the former.

"And they were given for the potters' field, as the Lord commanded me." It is plain these words are not exactly quoted, either from the Hebrew or the Septuagint: yet I cannot think the difference so great, as it at first appears; since those words in the parenthesis (τοις πιστοῖς ἤκουσαν Ἰσραήλ), which are not in either, may be considered as the words of the evangelist himself (to which he was naturally led by those of the prophet, A goodly price that I was prized at of them): and if, which might easily happen, could be written for slaves, as αὐτοὶ is ambiguous, it may be rendered yet nearer to the original, I took—and gave them, &c.—As for the general propriety of applying these words to this occasion, I think it may well be vindicated; for the connection and sense of the prophecy in the Old Testament seems to be this. In order to represent to Zechariah the contempt which Israel put upon their God, he had a vision to the following purpose. He thought God first appointed him to appear among them as a shepherd; (making him by that emblem a representation of himself;) after some time, he directs him to go to the rulers of Israel, and ask them, What they thought he deserved for his labour in that office? They give him the price of a slave, thirty pieces of silver; and this in the house of the Lord, where the court sat. On this, God as resenting this indignity offered to him in the person of his prophet, orders him to throw it down with disdain before the first poor labourer he met, who happened to be a potter at work by the temple gates, as a litter price for a little of his pottery ware, that a suitable acknowledgement of the favour they had received from God. Now surely if there was ever any circumstance in which the children of Israel behaved themselves so as to answer this visionary representation, it must be when they gave this very sum of thirty pieces of silver as a price for the life of that very Person whom God had appointed their great Shepherd. And, in order to point out the correspondence the more sensibly, Providence so ordered it, that the person to whom this money went should be a potter: though the prophecy would have been answered if he had been a fuller, or of any other profession. It may also be farther observed, that God's ceasing to be the Shepherd of Israel, which was represented by the prophet's breaking his pastoral staves, was never fully answered till their final rejection after the death of Christ; which may farther lead us to refer the affront of their giving the pieces of silver to this event.

—I do not remember ever to have seen this matter set in, what seems to me, its just and most natural light; but Grothus has some valuable hints upon it, which I wonder he did not pursue farther.

* After
notwithstanding the confession of Judas, the Jews had crucified Christ, and his friends had taken down his body from the cross, and laid it in Joseph's tomb on the evening of the sixth day of the week. On the morrow, or on the sabbath itself, which followed the day of preparation, the chief priests, and other Pharisees who belonged to the grand sanhedrim, assembled together in a body to wait upon Pilate, as with an address of solemn importance: Saying, Sir, we remember that this notorious deceiver, who was yesterday put to death for his crimes, and is well known to have practised many arts to impose upon the people while he was yet living, said, After three days I will rise again from the dead: We desire therefore, that since his friends have been intrusted with the care of interring him, thou wouldst order that the sepulchre where he is laid may be strictly guarded and secured till the third day is past: lest his disciples should come by night and steal him away, and upon this should tell the people that, according to his own prediction, he is risen from the dead: and so the last deceit will be worse than the first, and the deluded populace will be more eager to profess their regard to him after his death, than they ever were while he was living.

And Pilate said to them, You have a guard in waiting about your court in the temple; go your way therefore, and order as many of them as you think fit to march to the sepulchre, and to keep centry there all night, and thereby make [it] as secure as you possibly can.

And accordingly they went and took a detachment of soldiers with them to the garden of Joseph; and having first satisfied themselves that the corpse was there, they secured the sepulchre as well as they possibly could, sealing the stone, that it might not be broke open without a discovery of the fraud; and also setting a guard near the corpse was there.] Common prudence would teach them to do this; and perhaps they might feed their cruelty with viewing the dead body, as Herodias did with that sad spectacle the Baptist's head. See note 1 on Mark vi. 28, Vol. i. p. 408.

1 Sealing the stone.] Some have conjectured they might also cement it with lead, or bind it with iron; but the sabbath would hardly have allowed this. The guard would prevent nearly it, who took care to place themselves so that they could not but take an immediate alarm if any had presumed to make the least attempt to open the sepulchre, and remove the body, or even to embalm it.

IMPROVEMENT.

In how fatal a manner does the way of transgressors deceive them! Judas, no doubt, but a few hours before, was thinking with eager impatience of receiving this sum of money, which was the wages of unrighteousness: but though he might for a little while roll it as a sweet morsel under his tongue, yet how soon was it turned into the gall of asps within him? (Job xx. 12—14.)

We see the force of conscience, even in the worst of men. He that had slighted all the warnings that his Master gave him, and neither was affected by the remembrance of his goodness to him, nor by the fear of his displeasure, while he was set upon accomplishing his covetous design, no sooner comes to feel the sting of an awakened conscience, but he is filled with horror, and is unable to endure the cutting anguish of his own reflections. And thus could God, in a moment, drive the most hardened sinner into all the agonies of remorse and despair, by letting loose his own thoughts upon him, to prey upon his heart like so many hungry vultures, and make him a terror to others, and an executioner to himself.

We must surely admire the wisdom of Providence, in extorting even from the mouth of this traitor so honourable a testimony of the prevent violence; and the seal would be a security against any fraud of theirs in confederacy with the disciples, if that could possibly have been suspected. I have also hinted in the paraphrase above, that this precaution of sealing the sepulchre might prevent any attempt, not only to remove the body, but to embalm it. For it is to be considered, that they had great reason to believe, that when two such eminent persons as Joseph and Nicodemus had already paid such a public honour to the corpse, they would desire also to embalm it; which accordingly they did really design. This would be such an additional reflection on the proceedings of the sanhedrin as they would certainly desire to prevent. A mandate from Pilate for this purpose they could not be sure of obtaining had they asked it; nor would an act of their own court have been free from uncertainty and inconvenience. This method of sealing the stone was therefore the most artful expedient that could be imagined; which would effectually prevent it, without letting it be publicly known that they had the least suspicion of any such design. I state the matter thus largely, in regard to one of the most learned persons of the age, who seems to think this a very considerable difficulty.—But with respect to the principal point of his rising from the dead, it is surely most senseless to say, with that wretched opposer of the miracles of Christ, who has brought upon himself such just infamy, that this sealing the stone intimated a contract between Christ and them, that he should rise in the sight of the Jewish rulers on the third day. Probably their design was on the fourth day to have opened the sepulchre, and have exposed the corpse to public view; which had it been in their power, had been the most prudent step they could have taken. But they do not seem to have been mad enough to think, that if Jesus rose from the dead, it must be just when they thought fit to attend.
the innocence of Jesus, though to his own condemnation. And who could have imagined that the supreme court of Israel itself should have been so little impressed with it, as coldly to answer, What is that to us? See thou to that. Is this the language of rulers, yea, of priests? But they had cast off the fear of that God whose ministers they were, and had devoted themselves to gain and ambition. They therefore felt no remorse, even when Judas trembled before them; and appeared almost distracted under the sense of a crime in which they had been confederates with him. But their consciences were seared as with a red hot iron, and all their familiar converse with Divine things served only, in such a circumstance, to harden their hearts: as tempered steel gathers strength from the furnace and the hammer.

5 Judas repents; he confesses his crime; he throws away the reward of his guilt: yet was there nothing of godly sorrow in all this. Despairing, he becomes his own executioner; and flies to death, and to hell, as a refuge from the rage and fury of an awakened conscience. Fatal expedient! thus to seal his own damnation! But the righteous judgment of God erected him as a monument of wrath, and verified our Saviour's declaration, It had been good for that man if he never had been born: (Mat. xxvi. 24. and Mark xiv. 21. sect. clxx. p. 287.) Tremble, O our souls, at this thought! that Judas, even one of the twelve, should fall into such depths of sin and ruin! May we each of us be jealous over ourselves! and may we never presume to censure whole bodies of men for the fault of particular members, when we find there was a traitor and reprobate among the holy band of the apostles.

63, 64 We see the restless and implacable malice of Christ's enemies; which pursued him even to his tomb, and there endeavoured to blast his memory by fixing upon him the character of an impostor: They demanded, and procured a guard for his sepulchre: And here also we have a repeated instance of God's taking the wise in their own craftiness; (Job v. 13.) The seal and the guard served only more fully to attest the doctrine of Christ's resurrection, which they were set to overthrow, and to grace the triumph they were intended to oppose. Thus shall all the rage, and all the artifice of his enemies, at length promote the purposes of his glory: thus shall meat at length come out of the eater; and sweetness out of the strong; (Judg. xiv. 14.) The wrath of man, O Lord, shall praise thee; and the remainder of it shall thou restrain; and shalt triumph over it, either by thy grace, or by thy vengeance; (Psal. lxxvi. 10.)
Christ rising, from the dead, the guards flee away in astonishment: Mary Magdalene finding the sepulchre open, calls Peter and John, who having entered into it, return; while Christ himself makes his first appearance to her. MARK XVI. 1.

AND when the sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and [the other Mary], the mother of James, and Salome, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him. [Mat. xxviii. 1.]

a When the sabbath was over. This which Mark expresses by ἐκ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ, Matthew expresses by another phrase, 42: σαββατοφόρος, in the end of the sabbath, or when he saith (and consequently the preceding week, of which the sabbath was the last day,) was over; as in Philostratus, 43: μετάφησαν, when the mysteries were ended. So that the controversy between Majus and Wulfius, on the subject, seems needless; as the criticism of the former, who supposes these words in Matthew to belong to the close of the former chapter, and to refer to the time of sealing the sepulchre, is very unnatural; as Wulfius has shown in his learned note on Mat. xxviii. 1.

b Mary Magdalene, &c. with Joanna, and some other pious women. In the account the evangelists have given of the women who first came to the knowledge that Jesus was risen, Mary Magdalene is mentioned by all, the other Mary by the three first, and Salome only by Mark; but I have named Joanna here with the rest, as it appears from Luke xxiv. 10. in the next section, she was among the other women who went to the sepulchre, and was one of those who told these things to the apostles.

c They bought more spices, &c. Luke had before observed, (chap. xxiii. 56. p. 427,) that they prepared spices and ointments, and then rested the sabbath day according to the commandment: and Mark here says, that ἐκ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ, when the sabbath was over, ἐν πάντας they bought [not they had bought] spices, and then (ver. 2. very early in the morning,) came to anoint him. This I look upon as a strong intuition, that some time after six in the evening (on what we call Saturday night,) when the sabbath was over, as it was then lawful to perform any common work, their generous hearts prompted them to purchase a large quantity of aromatic drugs for this pious purpose.

d Setting out very early in the morning. The learned and ingenious Mr. West (of whose accurate Observations on the Resurrection of Christ I have given an extract at the end of the preface to the third volume of this work,) supposes Mary Magdalene, with the other Mary and Salome, was yet dark, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week, they went to take a view of the sepulchre, to see if all things were as they had left them: and not long after they were followed by Joanna and the rest who were to meet them there, who came at the appointed time, bringing the spices with them, which (as was said before,) they had prepared to embalm the body of Jesus, and which indeed were a considerable weight; and some [others] of their female friends went also with them to assist on this occasion.

And as they were advancing towards the sepulchre, they were not under any apprehension from the soldiers that were set to guard it, who had been stationed there without their knowledge on the sabbath-day, (sect. cxviii. p. 432.) but remembering the stone that was placed at the mouth of it, they said among themselves, Who shall roll away the stone for us from to have set out to view the sepulchre before the time they had agreed to meet Joanna and the other women there, who were to bring the spices and to come about sun-rising to embalm the body: and as the word ἐσπάρα, made use of in this place both by Mark and John (which we have rendered early) sometimes signifies over-early, or before the appointed time, he naturally conjectures it has this significance here, and concludes that the women came to the sepulchre at different times; the first setting out before the time agreed on, just as the day began to break, whereas the others came not thither till the sun was risen. (See West's Observ. p. 45, 46.) The difference between this and the scheme here given, chiefly consists in Mr. West's supposing the women to have made two different visits to the sepulchre, and in consequence of that, two distinct reports to the disciples, whereas I have united them; though I do not suppose them to have all come together to the sepulchre, but only to have met there. Yet such advantages attend the scheme this author has proposed, that if it had been published to the world before I had composed this Harmony, I should have chosen to have formed it in a nearer agreement to it, but have now left it to appear with no material alteration in its order.

They went to take a view of the sepulchre.] I have rendered the word ἔθηκαν, went (and have likewise explained the word ἔπαθαν in the same manner in the first verse of this section,) which agrees better with the order of the story, and is frequently the sense which our translators have rendered it elsewhere. See Mat. xii. 9, xiii. 36, xiv. 12, Mark iii. 19, Luke ii. 44, xiv. 1, John iv. 43, vi. 17, Acts iv. 22, xviii. 21—The true import of the word ἔθηκαν is to take a view; and thus implies their going to see if all things were in the same condition as before, when they had seen the body laid in the sepulchre. (Luke xxiii. 55, p. 426.—I think Mif- fitt and Elsner justly observe, that the xxiii. chapter of Luke should not have ended at the place it does; for here, as in several other places, a sentence is divided: [Τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ Καραβέλου ὁ λαός —ταῖς δὲ μας τοῦ ἀναπαύσεως—εἰρήνη, &c.] Such divisions are great instances of negligence in the person by whom they were first made; but in a work like this Harmony, they are less material, and hardly in some cases avoidable.

Some others of their female friends went also with them.] It was indeed a circumstance of decency, considering the office they were intending to perform, that the men and the women should perform their respective parts in it by themselves; which accordingly the evangelists plainly intimate they did. Their setting out alone was a remarkable instance of their zeal and courage; perhaps some appointment might be made with Peter and John, (who were early up, as it should seem, on this occasion,) either to meet them, or come after them, to assist in removing the stone, though not in embalming the body.
An angel had been there before, and rolled away the stone. 437 from the door of the sepulchre, which all of us together have not strength to remove? For they had seen Nicodemus and Joseph stop up the entrance with it; and it was indeed very large and heavy.

But this perplexity of theirs was altogether needless; for God had provided a very extraordinary way to remove that obstruction. And behold, with due regard and admiration, it was this: There was, but a little before they arrived there, a great earthquake (which would naturally awaken the guards, if any of them had fallen asleep) and very awful and astonishing were the circumstances that attended it; for an angel of the Lord descending from heaven, had approached in sight of the guards, and rolled away the stone from the door, and sat down upon it. And, at the very same time, Jesus, like a sleeping conqueror awaking on a sudden, burst asunder the bands of death, and sprung up to a new and immortal life. But none of the guards saw him rise, being struck into the utmost consternation at the sight of the angel, who appeared to remove the stone; and well indeed they might be so; for his countenance was like the brightness of lightning, and his long flowing garment was as white as snow, glittering with extraordinary lustre beyond what their eyes could bear. And the guards, though Roman and soldiers, trembled for fear at the sight of him, and became like so many dead men, falling down on their faces in a most helpless condition. But quickly after, presuming to lift up their eyes, and finding he had disappeared, and had left the sepulchre open, they fled to some distant place, to consult their own safety in so surprising an occurrence.

By this time the women, who had set out as it began to dawn, were near the place; and Mary Magdalene, transported with the distinguishing ardour of her affection; advanced a little before the rest; and, it being now light enough to discern objects, she looked forward, and saw, to her great surprise, that the stone was already taken away from the sepulchre, and that the

And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men.

John XX. 1. And Mary Magdalene seeth the stone taken away from the sepulchre.

They fled to some distant place, &c.] As nothing is said of an interview between them and the friends of Christ, there is great reason to believe that this was the case as indeed it is on other accounts probable it should be.

Mary Magdalene saw that the stone was taken away, &c.] Every attentive reader may Mary finding the sepulchre open.

And she was greatly astonished and alarmed at the sight, and presently concluded that the body was removed. She therefore stepped back, and informed her companions of this circumstance; upon which they [also] looked, and plainly found that it was as she represented, and that the stone was indeed rolled away from the entrance of the sepulchre.

And, not reflecting on the assurance Jesus had given them of his rising again from the dead, they knew not how to account for the removal of the stone; but Mary Magdalene and her companions having consulted a little together, as well as the confusion they were in would admit, it was thought best that some of the disciples, should be immediately acquainted with it: she therefore runs back to the city with all possible dispatch, and knowing where they lodged, she comes to Simon Peter, and to John, that other disciple whom Jesus peculiarly loved (by whom this may have observed how difficult it is to form the evangelists into one coherent story here, and to reconcile some seeming contradictions in their accounts: nevertheless I hope, on a careful examination of this and the following sections, it will be found not impracticable. I shall not mention the very different schemes other critics have taken, nor the particular objections against them; but would only add a word or two concerning that of Dr. Guyse, which is both new and ingenious, yet not to me satisfactory. He supposes (in his note on John xx. 2.) that there were two appearances of the angels to the women, and that Mark and Luke speak only of the first, and Matthew and John of the second; that is, in other words, (as I understand it,) That as soon as it was light these good women came to the sepulchre, and saw an angel, who told them, "He knew they sought Jesus, but that he was risen," and inviting them "to come and see the place where he was laid," charged them "to go and tell his disciples that he would go before them into Galilee." Upon this they go immediately and tell the disciples (without saying anything, that we find, of the vision) "that some unknown person had taken away the Lord, and led him—they knew not where;" and then returning again to the sepulchre, in less than an hour, they see another, or the same angel as before, who, as it were perfectly unknown by any former declaration, tells them just in the same words, "He knew they sought Jesus, but he was risen; and, inviting them again to come and see the place where he had lain," charges them again, "to go and tell his disciples that he went before them into Galilee." This is such a similarity of words and actions immediately succeeding each other as I believe can no where be paralleled.—The scheme I offer here (which is that which twice, at the distance of several years, presented itself to me on a view of the evangelists alone) is incurred with no such difficulty, nor indeed with any worth naming, except what arises from the transposition of Mark xvi. 2. and Luke xxiv. 12. on which see note 1 in this section, and note 2 in the next. [1. She therefore runs back to the city, &c.] It is not expressly said whether the women with whom she came thither stated any where near the sepulchre, or whether they returned to the city with her; but considering that John, who was an eye-witness, has mentioned only Mary Magdalene as running with the news, her companions in the mean while might stay at some distance till Peter and John came, and had viewed the sepulchre; and might be joined there by the other women who were to bring the spices, upon whose coming they might go into the sepulchre. (Compare Mark xvi. 9. and Luke xxiv. 3. in the beginning of the next section.)—John hints nothing at all of Mary's having looked into the sepulchre before she ran back to him; and his narration being the last, and most circumstantial, must guide us in adjusting what is ambiguous in the rest.

They
Peter and John run immediately to the sepulchre.

Luke xxiv. 12. — Then arose Peter [and went forth, and that other disciple, and came to the sepulchre.] [John xx. 3.]

They have taken away the Lord, &c.] It is difficult to suppose, with Dr. Clarke, Dr. Gayne, and many other critics, that she would have spoken thus if the angels had before this expressly assured her of Christ's resurrection, and sent her away with such a message as they did to the disciples. Compare note t on ver. 17.

And Peter arose.] These words in Luke come in after the account given by the women to the eleven, and all the rest of the disciples (Luke xxiv. 9), or the angels appearing to them, &c. and so make the chief objection against the scheme here offered to the reader: but the word then, with which this verse is introduced by our translators, does not well answer to ον μόνον in the original; and as we have often showed before, that Luke is not always so exact in his order as not to admit of some transposition, so it will run us into greater difficulties not to allow it in the present case, in which it is apparently reasonable to follow John's order, who was an eye-witness, and who gives the last and largest account. And indeed, if no transposition may be allowed, it is absolutely impossible in many passages of the gospel-history to make any consistent harmony of the evangelists at all; as every attentive reader must have often observed. This was the view in which I formerly considered the account that Luke has given (ver. 12) of Peter's visit to the sepulchre, which I have incorporated here with that of John, who at large relates their going there together, as soon as they received the first report from Mary Magdalene of the sepulchre being open, and the body gone: and, as Luke does not mention Peter's visit till after the report the women had who had seen the angels made to the disciples, it could not any way agree with that of John, without allowing the necessity of a transposition. But, on considering the observations made by Mr. West, I am now satisfied that Luke refers not to the visit which Peter made with John, but to a second visit which he made afterwards upon the women's coming with the report that they had seen two angels who had assured them Jesus was risen. These women Mr. West supposes to have been Joanna and the other women who came with the spices; upon whose coming to the disciples before the arrival of the two Marys and Salome, and telling them that they had seen two angels at the sepulchre, who had informed them Jesus was alive, Peter, willing to see if the angels were there, immediately arose and ran again to the sepulchre, and without entering in (as he had done before), but only stooping down and looking into it, as he could see no angel's there, but only the linen clothes lying (for so it is that the words το θημα το θαλαμου χρυσης should be rendered), came back again in great astonishment. (See West's Observ. p. 59, & seq.) This I now think to be the best solution of this difficulty, and there is thus no need of any transposition: of which I could not but inform the reader, as it is the principal circumstance in which the scheme that Mr. West has given differs from mine, though I have left the harmony to stand as before, that it may still be seen what I had offered, as it will either way be found sufficient to acquit the evangelists from any charge of absurdity or contradiction.
Finding only the clothes, return in surprise.

John XX. 4.—So they ran both together: and the other disciple did out-run Peter, and came first to the sepulchre.

5 And he stooping down, and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying; yet went he not in.

6 Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and [stooping down, he] went into the sepulchre, and seeth the linen clothes [laid by themselves]: [Luke xxiv.—12.]

7 And the napkin that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself.

8 Then went in also that other disciple which came first to the sepulchre, and being less adventurous than Peter, stood hitherto without, went in also to view it; and when he saw the several parts of the funeral dress in this situation, he was immediately convinced, and believed it now to be at least very probable that his dear Master was indeed revived. For hitherto they did not know the full meaning of those words have a force and a grace, on this interpretation, which I think no other can give them. Much of the beauty of John's manner of writing consists in such hints as these, which shew the temper of that excellent man; and, were he to be considered merely as a human historian, add great weight to his testimony. See note on John xxi. 20, sect. vii.

9 For as yet they knew not the scripture, that

\[\text{a} \text{ But folded up in a place by itself.}\]

Perhaps our Lord himself folded up the napkin; and this remarkable circumstance might be intended to signify the perfect calmness and composure with which he arose, transported with no rapture or surprise at his awaking out of this long sleep.—It would be very improper to inquire whence he had his clothes; the angels, no doubt, furnished him with them; and perhaps the diversity of their colour or form might prevent his being known by his friends at first sight.

\[\text{b He saw and believed.}\]

Many interpreters explain this only of his believing that the Lord was there; but that he must have believed before, on looking into the sepulchre.
that he must rise again from the dead.

10 Then the disciples went away again unto their own home; (Peter wondering in himself at that which was come to pass.) [Luke xxiv. 12.]

11 But Mary stood without at the sepulchre, weeping: and as she wept, she stooped down, and looked into the sepulchre,

12 And seeth two angels in white, sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain:

13 And they say unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? She saith unto them, Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.

14 And when she had thus said, she turned herself back, and saw Jesus standing, and knew not that it was Jesus,

Those various intimations of scripture to which Jesus had so often referred to convince them that he must certainly rise from the dead (compare Mat. xvi. 21, Vol. I. p. 465, and Luke xviii. 31—34, Vol. II. p. 132); which if they had considered they would cheerfully have expected the sure accomplishment of them, and would not have been so much surprised at the news which Mary brought them.

Then both the disciples went away again to their companions in the city, [Peter] not being so thoroughly satisfied as John was, yet greatly wondering in himself at what had happened, and very much concerned as to the event of so surprising a beginning.

But Mary, who was now returned, stood near the sepulchre after Peter and John were gone from it, not indeed going into it as they had done, but weeping without, in great perplexity at her not knowing what was become of Jesus; and as she wept, she also stooped down, [and looked] very wishfully into the sepulchre: And there she saw with great surprise two angels in the form of men, clothed in white habits, sitting one at the head, and the other at the feet, of that niche in the sepulchre where the body of Jesus had been laid. And they said to her, with a tender regard, Woman, why dost thou weep thus? And she said to them, Alas, I have reason enough to weep; it is because they have taken away the body of Jesus my dear Lord, and I know not where they have laid him, or how the sacred corpse may be neglected or abused.

And just as she had said this, hearing a sudden noise behind her, she turned back, before the angels could give her any answer; and she saw Jesus himself standing near her; and she knew not at first that it was Jesus, his habit being changed.

* Went away again to their companions.*

So ἀπελθοῦσα, as it seems evidently to signify; (compare Ewsm, Obscr. Vol. I. p. 348.) Accordingly soon after this the women found the eleven and the rest together. [Luke xxiv. 9.]—Ἀπέβησα, ἀπελθοῦσα never that I know of signifies to come to oneself, or to the exercise or possession of one's own mind, as some have strangely interpreted these words. Luke's expression in that case is different; Luke xv. 17, where he says of the prodigal, ἀπέβησα ἀπελθοῦσα, when he came to himself. It was very prudent in Peter and John to retire immediately, lest they should have been questioned by the rulers, if found near the sepulchre.

* They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.* This expression may very easily be accounted for in our manner of ranging this story; but it is very harsh to suppose she should speak in this manner if one of the angels had a few minutes before told her that Jesus was risen. She perhaps thought they came to do a kind of homage to the place where he had lain, if she apprehended them to be angels; which, whether she did or did not, we do not certainly know.

changed, her eyes also overflowing with tears, and her mind being so far from any expectation of his appearance, and so much distressed, that she did not so much as look up to the face of the person who appeared.

15 Then Jesus said to her, with a gentle voice, Woman, why dost thou weep thus? and whom dost thou seek? And she, supposing him to be the gardener, said to him, Sir, if thou hast for any unknown reason borne him away from hence, where the master of the sepulchre saw fit so honourably to lay him but a few hours ago, I earnestly beg thou wouldst immediately tell me where thou hast put him, and I will remove him, and take effectual care that his corpse shall be decently interred elsewhere, without giving any farther trouble here.

16 Jesus, on this, said to her, with a loud and distinct voice, in his usual affectionate way, Mary dost thou not know me? [And] Mary thereupon turning directly towards him, and eagerly fixing her eyes upon him, immediately discovered who it was; and, transported with a mixture of unutterable passions, she said to him, Rabboni; that is to say, [My great] Master and Teacher! and so much was her heart affected, that she could say no more, but immediately prostrated herself at his feet to embrace them.

17 But Jesus said to her, Do not stay here to embrace me [now], either to pay thine homage to me, or to confirm thy faith; both which thou wilt have other opportunities of doing; for I am not a Supposing him to be the gardener.] It is very probable that Jesus might speak low, or in a different way from what he usually did; and her taking him for the gardener seems to intimate there was nothing very splendid in his dress; accordingly when he appeared to the two disciples in their way to Emmaus, they seem to have taken him for a person of a rank not much superior to their own. Her eyes might also be withheld at first from knowing Jesus by some supernatural restraint, as theirs were. Luke xxiv. 16.

Sir, if thou hast borne him hence. It is observable that she accosts this stranger in respectful language, even when she took him for a servant (for sooner cannot, I think, signify the owner of the garden); prudently reflecting that an error on that hand would be more excusable than on the other, supposing he should have proved one of superior rank in a plain dress; and also that she does not name Jesus, but speaks in indefinite terms, if thou hast borne him hence; intimating that he was the one person of whom her own thoughts and heart were so full, that she took it for granted every one must know who she meant. Such language in such a circumstance was perfectly natural.—If there was any hedge or apartment near the sepulchre, so that while she spake to Jesus she was not visible to her companions, or if this avenue was such that, while they came up to it, the sepulchre was between her and them; or if they were now waiting at some distance, or coming up with a slower pace, being charged with the weight of the materials for embalming (nay one of which might very possibly be the case;) a difficulty with respect to the time of their coming to the sepulchre, which may offer itself to the sagacious reader, in the disposition of the following section, when compared with this, will disappear at once.

15 Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? whom seest thou? she, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.

16 Jesus saith unto her, Mary. She turned herself, and saith unto him, Rabboni, which is to say, Master.

17 Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended ascended to my Father: but go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father, and your Father, and to my God and your God.

not yet withdraw from your world, and ascended to the heavenly court of my Father, as you may imagine I should presently do; but I shall yet continue for a little while upon earth, and give you further opportunities of seeing me again: let nothing therefore now detain thee any longer, but go immediately to my dear brethren, for whom I have still the same affectionate regard as ever, and say unto them, I am risen from the dead, and after I have paid some visits to you, am shortly indeed to ascend into heaven, from whence I came: yet grieve not at that separation, but remember, that as I am going to him who is in a very peculiar sense my Father, so I shall still be mindful of your interest, and am also going to your Father, and [to] my God and your God; for such he is now become, through that covenant which he has established with you in me: on the whole, therefore, you have infinitely greater reason to rejoice than to mourn. And

Do not embrace me now, for I am not yet ascended to my Father.] Mr. Chandler, in his Answer to the Considerations on the Trial of the Witnesses, has given such convincing reasons in the present case for rendering the word embrace (which before apprehended to be the sense of it), that I think myself warranted in changing the version. We find indeed in the next section, that presently after this, when Jesus appeared to the women who were fleeing from the sepulchre, they were permitted to embrace him: (compare Mat. xxviii. 8, 9. and Mark xvi. 8. But this is well accounted for by Mr. West, as graciously designed to calm their minds, and to remove the terror they were under; while Mary, who was under no such terror, had her grief dispersed at once, and was immediately convinced that it was Christ upon his calling her by her name. And, to induce her not to wait for any thing more at present, it was a very proper consideration that our Lord subjoins, For I am not yet ascended to my Father; in which he at once assured her that he was not yet quitting this world, and plainly intimated his intention of seeing her and his disciples again, and paying frequent visits to them before his final departure, when what he had lately said to his disciples, of his going to the Father (John xvi. 28), should be fulfilled by his ascension into heaven. (See West's Observ. p 167, & seq.)—The sense is obvious and easy in this view, and Dr. Whitby (in his Note on this place), Mr. Fleming (Christ. Vol. III. p. 502), Mr. Crudock, and others, interpret these words as I have done in the paraphrase; and it is strange that Mr. Whiston should think this text inexplicable, unless we suppose "that Christ was immediately to ascend to his Father, before he could at all converse with any of them, or receive the expressions of their homage to him." (See the Appendix to his Sermons at Boyle's Lect. p. 299—300.) If there had been any necessity for his ascending immediately, he surely would not first have appeared to Mary, and then to the other women on their way to the city. The interpretation here given suits the words as well, and other scriptures much better. She probably thought that if he was risen he was also returned back to his heavenly Father, to keep up his stated abode with him again, as he quickly after did: to assure her therefore of the contrary was exceeding proper, and the best reason that could be given to persuade her to wave any farther discourse now, with which to be sure she must otherwise have been earnestly desirous to detain her dear Lord.—To suppose, with Messrs. L'Enfant and Becassiere, that she meant this adoration as homage to a temporal prince, and that our Lord's answer was chiefly intended as a declaration that he must ascend to his Father before he received his kingdom, appears to me very unnatural.

Go to my brethren, &c.] By calling the disciples his brethren and God their Father and their God, he intimates in the strongest manner the full forgiveness of their fault in leaving him, even without ever mentioning it; just as the Father of the prodigal,
And upon saying this he immediately disappeared for the present; and the other women, advancing to the sepulchre, where the angels continued, received the news of his resurrection from them, and were directed, as Mary Magdalene also was, to report it to the disciples, with a variety of additional circumstances, which will be mentioned in the following section.

IMPROVEMENT.

How fit is it that we should sing unto the Lord a new song! and with what thankful hearts should we join, on his own day, and on every day, to congratulate the triumph of his rising from the dead, and to rejoice in this birth-day of our hopes! Now is the justice of God amply satisfied, or the prisoner had never been released. Now is the reproach of the cross ceased, and turned into proportionable glory. That reproach was rolled away at once by the descending angel, who appeared, not to awaken Christ from his sleep, or to bring him a new life, for he had himself a power, whenever he pleased, to resume that which he had voluntarily resigned (John x. 18); but he came to add a solemn pomp to his revival, and to strike the guards with such a terror as would effectually prevent any mad attempt on this glorious Conqueror, when he was bursting the bonds in which he had for a while been held.

O Lord, we acknowledge the truth of thy promise: thou didst not leave his soul in hell, neither didst thou suffer the flesh of thine Holy one to see corruption (Psal. xvi. 10.) Now is Christ indeed risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept (1. Cor. xv. 20): may we, in conformity to his holy example, be dead to sin, and to the world; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also may walk in newness of life! (Rom. vi. 4.) Then will he that raised up Christ from the dead, ere long, quicken our mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in us. (Rom. viii. 11.)

Let the faith of what has been done with regard to our glorified Head, and shall at length be accomplished with respect to all his members, daily gladden our hearts. When our eyes are weeping, and our souls sinking within us, let us raise our thoughts to Jesus, our risen, and now ascended Redeemer, who says to all his brethren brethren these gracious words (which may justly be received with transports of astonishment, and fill our hearts at the same time with joy unspeakable, and full of glory), "I ascend to my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God."

The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is now, through the death and resurrection of his dear Son (whom by raising him from the dead he has so solemnly owned under that relation, become our Father and our God. As such let us honour him, love him, and rejoice in him: and when we must leave this world, which Christ has long since left, let it delight our souls to think that we shall likewise ascend after him, and dwell with him in his propitious Divine presence. In the mean time, if we are risen with Christ, let us seek those things which are above, where Christ now sitteth at the right-hand of God (Col. iii. 1); and let us be willing, in whatever sense God shall appoint, to be made conformable to his death, that we may also be partakers of his resurrection and glory. (Phil. iii. 10, 11.)

SECT. CXCIV.

Christ having appeared to Mary, the other women come to the sepulchre, and are informed of his resurrection by the angels. He appears to the women as they return to the city; but neither their testimony, nor that of Mary, is received by the disciples: Mat. XXVIII. 5.—10. Mark XVI.—2, 5—11. Luke XXIV. 3—11. John XX. 18.

Mark XVI. 9.

NOW when Jesus was risen early, the first day of the week he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils.

—2 And they [i.e. the other women] came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun.

Mark XVI. 9.

We have just now seen in the preceding section, that when Jesus was risen from the dead, very early on the first day of the week (which day was afterwards observed by his followers in commemoration of this important fact), he made his first appearance to Mary Magdalene, out of whom (as was formerly said) he had some time before ejected no less than seven demons, who by an awful providence were permitted to join together in afflicting her. (Compare Luke viii. 2, Vol. I. p. 319.)

But it is now time to return to the women,—2 her companions, from whom she had parted when she went to inform Peter and John that the sepulchre was open (John xx. 2, p. 436). These were now joined by [the other women] who had brought the spices, and, while Mary was engaged in this interview with Christ, came up together to the sepulchre: and it was now about
Two angels appear, and tell them Jesus is risen.

And the time of the rising of the sun. And having found the passage open without any obstruction in the way, and observed as they stood at a distance that Peter and John had done the like, they entered into the sepulchre themselves; but, as they had before suspected on seeing it open, they found not the body of the Lord Jesus.

And it came to pass, that as they were in great perplexity on this account, and knew not what to think was become of the body, behold, to their inexpressible astonishment, they saw the two angels whom Mary had seen but a little before (who had disappeared upon their coming to the sepulchre, but now rendered themselves visible at once) in the form of men, arrayed in splendid habits, [who] came and stood by them, the women being unable to discover how they came in; and [one of them] appeared like a young man, with a beautiful and cheerful aspect, clothed in a long white robe, glittering with lustre like the purest snow: and this was the angel who appeared at first to the guards, and who had been afterwards seen by Mary, sitting on the right side of the entrance into the sepulchre. And they were greatly terrified at this extraordinary and surprising sight; and, stepping back to the very door, they bowed their faces to the ground, and fixed their eyes upon it, in token of the profoundest respect.

But the angel, in a most mild and condescending manner, answered and said unto the women,

Do not be terrified at what you see; for we appear to comfort rather than afflict you, and have the

Like XXIV. 4. And they entered [unto the sepulchre], and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. [Mark xvi. 5. —]

4 And it came to pass as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold (they saw) two men, [and] stood by them in shining garments; [one of them a young man, who had been sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment.], [Mark xvi. — 5. —]

5—And [they were astonished], and bowed down their faces to the earth. [Mark xvi. — 5.]

Mat. XXVIII. 5. And the angel answered and said unto the women, [Be not affrighted:] for I know that

They bowed their faces to the ground, and fixed their eyes upon it, &c.] The words καί ὡς ἐπιστάναι τὸ ἐμφανίζων τὸν θάνατον, do not intimate their protruding themselves before the angels, but a respectful and reverential declining their heads, and looking downward that they might not appear to gaze; which is well known to have been forbidden to the Jews upon the sight of a celestial vision: (see Exod. xix. 21; and compare Jud. xiii. 20.) And it was also considered as dangerous by the heathen, when their deities, or any celestial messengers from them, were supposed to make themselves visible; as Plutarch has finely shewn in his learned and entertaining Nods here. Etg. Obers. Vol. I. p. 283.

a But the angel answered, &c.] I entirely agree with Mr. Wetst, that the particle & should here be rendered But. See Wetst's Obser. p. 23.

Re-
that ye seek Jesus (of Nazareth,) which was crucified: [Luke x. Why seek ye the living among the dead?] [Mark xvi. 6. Luke xxiv. 3.]

And Collect.

*I know, that in the strength of your affection you are come to seek that holy and excellent Person, Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified the other day, and buried here: but why seek ye the living among the dead? and why are you come hither with materials for embalming one who is possessed of an immortal life? He is not here, but is risen this morning, as he said that he should: behold, the tomb where they laid him; the body is not here: come in, and satisfy yourselves by the strictest inquiry; and view, with all the mixture of holy affections which are suitable to such a circumstance, the place where the Lord of life and glory, the Prince of angels and men, lay for a while a breathless corpse: but he has now triumphed over the grave; and you have no reason to be surprised to hear it; for it not only was most probable in itself that this would be the case, but he also often foretold it. Remember particularly how he spake unto you, when he was yet in Galilee with you, where I know with what kindness you attended and ministered to him; Recollect that remarkable saying of his which was so often repeated, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinners, and be crucified, and the third day he shall rise again (see Mat. xvi. 31, Vol. I. p. 465; xvii. 22, 23, Vol. I. p. 483. and xx. 18, 19, p. 132): now this, as you well know, is the third day; and what he said is most exactly verified. [And, while the angel spake thus, they called to mind what they had heard from Jesus, and perfectly remembered his words. But go quickly, added he, and communicate to your friends the joy which you now feel; yea, go and tell his mourning disciples, and particularly tell Peter, who is so overwhelmed with his peculiar sorrows, that he is risen from the dead: and acquaint them also, in further confirmation of the truth of it, Behold, he is shortly going before you into Galilee; for I am commissioned to assure

3. And they remembered his words.

*Remember how he spake unto you, when he was yet in Galilee.] This familiar manner in which the angel speaks of what passed between Jesus and them in Galilee, seems to intimate, that he had then been present, though invisible, and heard what Jesus said. The hint suggests many agreeable reflections, which the pious reader will dwell upon at leisure.—The mention which he afterwards makes of Peter, whether it were or were not by a particular charge from Christ, is also observable in the same view.

6 He is going before you into Galilee.] When we consider this expression of the angel to the women, as Mark has related it assure you that there shall ye all see him, as he said to you that he would meet you there: (compare Mat. xxvi. 32. and Mark xiv. 28. p. 343.)

Lo, I, who am one of the angels that stand in the presence of God, have told you this, and my associate is here ready to attest it; and therefore, important and wonderful as the message is, you need not at all scruple to report it.

And upon this, instead of making any farther scrutiny, they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre as fast as possible; for they trembled, and were amazed at this angelic vision: and, whoever they met by the way, they said nothing to any one of them, for they were very much afflicted; [but] with hearts full of fear at what they had seen, and with a mixture also of great joy at this happy news which they had received in so awful a manner, they ran with all the speed they could to bring his disciples word.

And as they were going on their way to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus himself met them, into Galilee, there shall ye see him, [as he said unto you:] Lo, I have told you. [Mark xvi. 7]

Mark XVI. 8. And they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre; for they trembled, and were amazed: neither said they any thing to any man, for they were afraid; [and with fear and great joy did run to bring his disciples word.] [Mat. xxviii. 8]

[προφανής, &c.] the construction shows, as the learned Bos observes (Exercit. p. 29), that these words are the message which the angel puts into the mouth of those women, to be delivered by them to the apostles. But what is added [there shall ye see him] may, consistent with this criticism, be understood as in the paraphrase, which makes the sense more complete, by adding a very material, and, to them who so tenderly loved Jesus, a very delightful circumstance; namely, that they should see him themselves, and not merely receive the most credible assurances of his resurrection from others.

They went out quickly.] This is the exact import of the word ἐκπεφανής, which is the same in both the evangelists, but is improperly rendered here in Matthew, they departed. (See West's Observ. p. 366.)

b With fear and joy.] It was so natural for such a mixture of passions to arise on this grand occasion, that I think very little stress is to be laid on Mark's mentioning their fear alone, and Matthew's mentioning their joy with it, to prove they relate different stories.—I have since the pleasure to find, that this is represented in the same light by Mr. West, who has clearly shewn that both these sacred writers speak of the same fact. (See West's Observ. p. 37—40.

'And as they were going on their way to tell his disciples.] Admitting what is here supposed, that there was but one vision of angels (besides that to Mary Magdalen), and one message sent by them, this will I think establish the order in which we have ranged this story. For if (as Dr. Clarke and many other critics strangely suppose) Mary's interview with the apostles (John xx. 1.) had happened between the angelic vision and this appearance of Christ to the women, such a connection as this would have been very unnatural. Matthew would have that hypothesis rather have said, And when they had told his disciples [and they believed them not], Jesus met them, &c.—But Mr. West who apprehends that there were several distinct appearances of angels, and two distinct appearances of Christ to the women (the first to Mary Magdalen, and the second to the other Mary and Salome, when the other women, were not present), concludes, that these several facts were reported to the apostles at different times, and by different women; and that Joanna and the other women, who had only seen the angels after the two Maries and Salome were gone from the sepulchre, made their report to the apostles before the arrival of the two Maries and Salome; and by thus representing the story in a different order he obviates the difficulty arising from the account which the two discipies that were going to Emmaus give of the report they had heard from the women. Luke xxiv. 22—24. (See West's Observ. p. 77, 86, seq.)
And bids them not be afraid, but go and tell his brethren.

10 Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid: go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

Luke xxiv. 9.—And [they] returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things unto the eleven, and to all the rest.

k Jesus himself met them.] I cannot think, with Dr. Lightfoot Har. Heb. in loc.] that this relates to his interview with Mary Magdalene described before; for though an enallage or exchange of numbers be sometimes used (see note l on Luke xxiii. 39, p. 409), yet it is not to be admitted without necessity. Now it is certain Mary was alone when Christ appeared to her; and that appearance was at the sepulchre, this between that and the city, and probably after they dispatched some considerable part of the way in their flight. The words [as they went to tell his disciples] are indeed wanting in many ancient versions and manuscripts, as Dr. Mill has shewn in his Note on this place: but Dr. Whitby, with considerable reason, contends that they are genuine (see his Examen. Millii, p. 91); and the sense of them seems implied in the close of the preceding verse.

1 My brethren.] The reader will observe our Lord speaks the same language here which he had used John xx. 17. (See note 3 on that text, p. 443.) No doubt these affectionate friends of Christ were exact in reporting this circumstance, that their injured Lord called them his brethren still. And both Matthew and John, to whom the glad tidings were immediately brought, felt it strike so powerfully on their hearts, that they could not but record it.

m And to all the rest.] This I think refers not only to one report, but to the repetition of the testimony to any of their pious friends who believed in Jesus: and it that be admitted, it will be an additional proof that what is said in ver. 12 should be translated in such a manner as is necessary for reconciling it with the scheme we have proposed in the preceding section. Compare note 3 on Luke xxiv. 12, p. 442.
They go and tell all these things to the disciples.

And they were Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary [the mother] of James and Joses, and Salome, and the other women that had gone with them to the sepulchre, as above, with an intent to embalm Christ's body (p. 435), who were the persons that were thus honoured with this message from the angels, and from Christ himself; and who accordingly came and told these things to the apostles, who had none of them as yet seen anything more themselves than that the sepulchre was empty, and the linen clothes laid in order. And Mary Magdalene in particular went with the other women, and told the disciples that had been so constantly with him, as they were mourning and weeping for the loss of their dear Master, that she also had seen the Lord; and that indeed he had appeared to her the first of all the company, and had spoken these gracious things unto her as well as to them relating to his resurrection from the dead, and had expressly ordered her to acquaint them with his purpose of ascending ere long to his Father and their Father, and to his God and their God. (Compare John xx. 17, p. 442.)

11 But such were the prevailing prejudices that had possessed the minds of the disciples, and so entirely were their spirits dejected, and their hopes blasted by the death of their Lord, that though they could not think this was related with a design to impose upon them, yet they were ready to impute it to the power of imagination; and even when they heard that he was actually alive, and had been seen by her, and by the other women who also testified the same, they did not in general believe it; but their words seemed to most of them as an idle tale, and they determined to suspend their belief of so important a fact till they were satisfied of it by the testimony of their own senses; which, through the great condescension of their Lord, several of them were before the end of that day, as we shall quickly relate.

We are now again called, as by the angel's voice, to come and see the place where the Lord lay, and to take an affectionate sur-

Now while these extraordinary things were transacting, and the [women] were going to tell the disciples, what they had heard and seen, behold, some of the guards, who had fled from the sepulchre in great consternation, began a little to recollect themselves, as to the excuse they should make for its being broke open, and the body being gone, as it would soon be known that that it was: they came therefore into the city, and told the chief priests, from whom they had received their immediate charge, all that had happened; and urged how impossible it was for them to make any opposition in the presence of the angel, who shook the very earth with the terror of his appearance, and therefore might be easily supposed to take away all power of resistance from them. And thus these ignorant and stupid heathens became in effect the first preachers of Christ’s resurrection, and were witnesses of the truth of it to the most inveterate of his enemies.

This report could not but strike the chief priests into some amazement and confusion: and therefore they immediately convened the sanhedrim; and having met together with the elders of the people, they deliberated upon it, and consulted among themselves what they should do in so perplexing an emergency; and particularly whether they should dismiss the guards with a charge to conceal the story they had told them, or should accuse them to the governor, and attempt to punish them for neglecting their duty: but, considering the manner in which the governor had appeared affected towards Jesus, and the many prodigies which had attended his death, by which Pilate’s conscience must have been in some degree awakened; and also knowing they had no positive proof of any negligence or treachery in the soldiers, they resolved to commence no prosecution against them, and to pass it over without any complaint; but, apprehending that the most effectual method they could take would be to endeavour to pervert their evidence, they gave a large [sum of] money to the soldiers. Saying, Since this strange tales of their own priests, which bore some little resemblance to it; as those of Alcestis, Hippolytus, Hercules, and many others did. See Valer. Marc. lib. i. cap. viii. § 12, and Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. vii. cap. 53.

Saying, Say ye, his strange thing has happened, whether there really was any sorcery in it, or whether it was merely your dream, it must for the public safety be concealed, or the whole nation will be deluded and undone; we must therefore insist upon it, that neither you, nor your companions, say any thing of what you imagine you saw; but if any should question you about it, and pretend that this Jesus is risen, say ye only in the general, We were weary with so long a watch, and dropped asleep; and we conclude, that his disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept. And you have no need to be afraid of being punished for your negligence; for if this should come to be heard by the governor, and he should blame you for sleeping on your guard, we will persuade him to make no farther inquiry about it, and by our interest with him will make you easy and secure.

And they took the money that was offered them, and did as they were taught; and, according to their instructions, they concealed what they had seen, and pretended that some of the disciples must have taken advantage of their weariness and neglect, and so have carried off the body while they were fallen asleep. And such are the prejudices of that unhappy people, that this story, wild and senseless as it was, is commonly reported among the Jews even to this day:

he been fully in their power, would have been in imminent danger. Could they have proved any neglect, no doubt these soldiers would have been prosecuted to the utmost (as Peter's guards were afterwards, Acts xix. 19.) But as they were destitute of all proof, it was prudence not to prosecute them at all; for, had Pilate acquitted them, it would have been in effect a public declaration, that he was convinced Jesus was indeed risen.

b Whether there really was any sorcery in it, &c. They must, to be sure, be puzzled to account for this strange event: and, laying it down as a first principle, "that Jesus must be an impostor" they would, of course, incline to impute his resurrection, as they had ascribed his miracles to some diabolic operation. It is however probable, that such artful men might speak of it in such loose terms as the parable represents, that they might not seriously endeavour to persuade the guards they were in a dream.

And stole him away while we slept.] It was ridiculous to pretend to say with any certainty what passed while they were asleep; so that this was in effect only hiring them to say, that they knew nothing of the matter, and did not observe anything more than ordinary had passed that night. How absurd this preface was, a thousand circumstances concur to shew: as most writers in defence of Christianity have demonstrated, and perhaps none, in few words, better than Bishop Burnet on the Articles, p. 64.

Reported among the Jews even to this day.] This seems to intimate, that Matthew wrote his gospel several years after our Lord's resurrection.—As to the industry of the Jews in propagating this report, it is very observable that Justin Martyr, [Dialog. cum Tryph. p. 355. Edit. Thirbl.] expressly asserts, "that the Jews sent chosen men of considerable rank over all the world, not only in the general to represent Christianity as an impious sect, but to assert, that the body of Jesus was stolen out of his tomb by night, and that the persons who thus fraudulently conveyed him away, took occasion from thence to report that he rose from the dead, and ascended and they still choose, in opposition to the most certain evidence, to believe this extravagant suggestion, rather than yield to the truth of Christ's resurrection, though solemnly attested to them, by many who saw and conversed familiarly with him after he was risen from the dead; of which number "Peter was one, who was early distinguished by the favour of seeing him, and to whom indeed he appeared first of all the apostles." (See 1 Cor. xv. 5.)

ed into heaven." And this message is spoken of, as having been sent before the destruction of Jerusalem. Compare note a on Acts xviii. 22. Vol. III. sect. ix.

Peter was one,—to whom he appeared first of all the apostles. Though the evangelists have not recorded the particular circumstances of our Lord's appearance to Peter, yet it is evident that he appeared first to Peter, before he was seen by the rest of the apostles. (Compare I Cor. xv. 5. and Luke xxiv. 34.) Dr. Lightfoot therefore supposes, that Peter was one of the two disciples to whom Christ appeared as they were going to Emmaus; and imagines, he was so earnestly desirous to obtain a sight of Christ, that upon hearing from the women, (Mat. xxviii. 7, 8.) that he would go before them to Galilee, where they should see him, he presently set out with Cleopas for Galilee; but, having seen him in their way to Emmaus, they hastened back to Jerusalem to acquaint the disciples with it; upon which the rest of the eleven, as they knew of Peter's journey, when they saw him return so suddenly and unexpectedly, cried out, Certainly the Lord has appeared to Simon, else he would never have come back so soon. (See Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. on Mark xvi. 13. and Luke xxiv. 34.) But, had Peter been one of these two disciples, it is no way probable that, in the large account which Luke has given of this matter, (chap. xxiv. 13. & seq.) his name would not have been mentioned as well as that of Cleopas; or that a person of his forwardness would have continued silent, and have left Cleopas to carry on the conversation as the chief speaker; nor does it suit with the circumstances of the story, that after Peter's going to the sepulchre had been related just before, it should be only spoken of in this conversation, (ver. 24.) as what was done, not by one of themselves, but by certain of them that were with them; or that it should be said, when they returned to Jerusalem, (ver. 33.) that they found the eleven gathered together, if one of those that returned belonged to that number, and was one of these eleven. (Compare note b Luke xxiv. 34. sect. ccviii.)

He appeared to two of them, &c.] The only reason which Musius has for suspecting Supplem. Critic. Vol. ii. p. 1788. that this appearance was different from that which Luke describes as made to the two disciples that were on their journey to Emmaus (chap. xxiv. 13. & seq.) is this: the companions of these two disciples are represented here by Mark as not believing the resurrection of Christ when attested by them: whereas when the two disciples from Emmaus came to make this report, the rest, before they could tell their story, saluted them with that joyful declaration, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. (Luke xxiv. 34.) But I apprehend these seemingly different accounts may be reconciled, by observing, that various persons in the same company were variously impressed: and that some of those to whom the travellers from Emmaus came, had even after their story was told, some remaining doubt, appears from Luke himself. See Luke xxiv. 37, 41. sect. ccvii. and note a on Mat. xxviii. 17. sect. ccvi.

Into the country to Emmaus, &c.] Emmaus was a village about sixty furlongs distant.
And they went back directly, and told it to the rest of their companions; yet they did not all immediately believe them, till at length he appeared to all his apostles together once and again, and gave them such convincing evidence as they could not withstand. But these facts are of so great importance, that we shall give a particular narration of each, and first of that which happened on the way to Emmaus, in the next section.

IMPROVEMENT.

Surely there is nothing in the whole sacred story which does in a more affecting manner illustrate the deplorable hardness of the human heart in this degenerate state, than the portion of it which is now before us. What but the testimony of an apostle could have been sufficient to persuade us, that men who had been but a few hours before the witnesses of such an awful scene, who had beheld the angel descending, had felt the earth trembling, and had seen the sepulchre bursting open by a Divine power, and had fallen down in helpless astonishment and confusion, perhaps expecting every moment to be themselves destroyed, should that very day, yea, that very morning, suffer themselves to be hired by a sum of money to do their utmost to asperse the character of Christ, and to invalidate the evidence of his resurrection, of which they were in effect eye-witnesses?

Nay, how astonishing is it, that the chief priests themselves, the public ministers of the Lord of hosts, could act such a part as this! They hear this full evidence that he, that Jesus whom they had murdered, was risen from the dead; and they well knew and remembered that he had himself put the proof of his mission on this very fact; a fact to which the prodigies at his death, which they themselves had seen and felt, added an inexpressible weight of probability. Who would not have expected that they should have been alarmed, convinced, and humbled; that they should have turned the remaining days of the passover into a public fast, and have solicitously sought out him who was so powerfully declared to be the Son of God, to cast themselves at his feet, and entreat his pardon and grace? But instead of this, with invincible and growing malice, they set themselves to oppose him, and bribe the tant from Jerusalem, as we are told by Luke (chap. xxiv. 13.) and Josephus gives the same account of its situation, Bell. Jud. lib. 7. cap. 6. (al. 26.) § 6. And therefore, though they have been frequently confounded, this must have been a different place from that which was afterwards called Nicopolis, which lay near the Lake of Gennesareth, at a much greater distance from Jerusalem. See Roland Palatins. lib. ii. cap. vi.p. 427. & seq.

the soldiers to testify a lie, the most to his dishonour of any that hell could invent. And surely, had not Christ been kept out of their sight and power, they would, notwithstanding all this, have endeavoured to bring him down to the tomb again, on the very same principles on which they would have slain Lazarus after his resurrection, (John xii. 10.) So true does it appear, in this renewed and unequalled instance, that if men hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead. (Luke xvi. 31.)

No question but these very men, when pressed with the evidences of Christ's resurrection, answered, as succeeding infidels have presumptuously done, "that he should have appeared to them, if he expected they should believe he was risen." But what assurance can we have that the same prejudices which overbore the testimony of the soldiers, might not also have resisted even the appearance of Christ himself? Or, rather, that the obstinacy which led them to overbear conscience in one instance, might not have done it in the other? Justly therefore did God deny what wantonness, and not reason, might lead them to demand: justly did he give them up to dishonour their own understandings, as well as their moral character, by this mean and ridiculous tale, which brought men to testify what was done while they were asleep.

"The most that common sense could make of their report, had they deserved the character of honest men, would have been, that they knew nothing of the matter. And we have a thousand times more reason to admire the condescension of God, in sending his apostles to these wicked rulers with such additional proofs and messages, than to censure his providence in preventing Christ's public appearance. May he deliver us from the treachery and corruption of our own hearts! May he give us a holy tenderness and integrity of soul, that we may see truth wheresoever it is, and may follow it whithersoever it leads us; lest God should choose our delusions, and give us up in his righteous judgment to believe a lie, and to think ourselves wise in that derelictous infidelity which is destroying its ten thousands amongst us!"

SECT. CXCVII.

Christ appears to the two disciples on their way to Emmaus, and, having opened the scriptures to them, makes himself known in breaking of bread. Luke XXIV. 13—32.

LUKE XXIV. 13.

We are now to give some farther account of that fact which was hinted at in the close of
And enters into conversation with them as a stranger.

14 And they talked together of all these things which had happened.

15 And it came to pass, that while they communed together, and reasoned, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them.

16 But their eyes were holden, that they should not know him.

*Argued the point together.] The word συμφωνεῖν (as Mr. West observes) signifies to discuss, examine, or inquire together; and it appears from the connection, that as they were discoursing on the sufferings, and death, and resurrection of Jesus, the scope of their inquiry was how to reconcile these events with what had been foretold concerning the Messiah, which, by the message that the women had had just before brought from the angels, they were particularly called to remember. (Compare Luke xxiv. 6, 7. p. 447, and xviii. 31—33, p. 132.) Accordingly when Jesus had inquired, ver. 17, What arguments are these that ye are debating one with another? (for so Mr. West would render it) this is the point he took occasion to illustrate and explain (ver. 26, 27.) by shewing them it was necessary, in accomplishment of what was foretold, that the Messiah should suffer these things, and so should enter into his glory, and with this view he expounded to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself. (See West's Observ. p. 69—73.)

b They did not know him.] A different habit, and their having no expectation of seeing him, might, in part, prevent their knowing him; yet, as it is said their eyes were restrained from knowing him, I am ready to think there was something more than this, even some particular agency of God, to divert their eyes from looking steadfastly upon him, or so to affect their memories as to render them incapable of recollecting who he was. Compare Gen. xxi. 19. Numb. xxii. 31. and 2 Kings vii. 17, 18.
They tell him the concern they were under about Jesus,

And he joined himself to them, as it were by accident, and, after the usual salutation, said to them, May I inquire what are these matters which you are conferring upon yourselves, as you walk, and about which you seem to be so much concerned? for I perceive you to be very earnest in discourse, and see that you appear with a sorrowful countenance.

And one [of the two], whose name was Cleopas, answered and said to him, You seem to be come from Jerusalem, and though you may perhaps be no more than a stranger there, yet is it possible that you should be at any loss to know what is the subject of our conversation, and what it is that gives us such concern? Are you the only person that sojourns in Jerusalem, and is unacquainted with the extraordinary things which have been done there in so public a manner within these few days, that they engross the conversation of the whole city?

And he said to them, What are those things that you refer to? And they said to him, Those that relate to Jesus, who was called the Nazarene; a man who was a prophet of the most illustrious character, and greatly powerful both in actions and in words; for he wrought the most astonishing miracles, and taught the most instructive and excellent doctrine, which raised him to the highest honour before God, and all the people of Israel, among whom he publicly appeared for several months and years. And have you not then heard, how our chief priests and rulers delivered him up to the Roman governor, and compelled him by their importunity to pass a sentence of death upon him, and so crucified him between two robbers? And this must needs be an unspeakable affliction to us, who are two of his disciples: for we not only thought him a Messenger from God, as the old prophets were, but we verily hoped that he had been the Messiah himself, even the very person who should have delivered Israel from the power of their enemies, and side all this, to-day is the third day since these things were done, and have established the long-expected kingdom of God among us: but now we are ready to give up all our hopes; for we have seen him on a cross instead of a throne: and besides all these melancholy [occurrences], though he had given us intimations of his rising again on the third day, yet this is now the third day since these things were done, or since he was condemned and crucified, and we have not yet received any convincing evidence of his being risen from the dead. It is true indeed, some women among us, of our society, have greatly surprised us with an account they brought this morning; who tell us, they were very early at the sepulchre in which he was laid, with an intent to embalm him; and, not having found his body there, they came away in haste to acquaint us with it; and besides this they say, that they also saw a vision, or apparition, of angels, who affirmed him to be alive again, with some other strange and extraordinary circumstances. Nay, and some men too who were with us, of our own company, went themselves to the sepulchre, and found [if] to be even so as the women had said, that is, that the body was gone, and saw the funeral linen laid

22 Yea, and certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre:

23 And when they found not his body, they came, saying, that they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that he was alive.

24 And certain of them which were with us, went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said. — And say that they saw also a vision of angels. — According to the order in which the story is digested in the preceding section the women did not come to the disciples with the report of what they had seen between the appearance of the angels and that of Christ to them; but had first seen both, and therefore must undoubtedly have mentioned both: it may however be concluded, that (as Luke says on their relating what they had seen, ver. 11, their words seemed to them as an idle tale, and they believed them not) these travels might apprehend what the women took for an appearance of Christ was at most but a vision of angels (as some imagined with respect to Peter, Acts xii. 15); and what is added in the next verse, with relation to the men there spoken of [but him they did not see] may perhaps imply that the women pretended also to have seen Jesus himself. — But I am now inclined to acquiesce in Mr. West's solution of this difficulty, who supposes it was Joanna, and the other women with her, who only saw the angels and did not see Jesus, that came with this report to the disciples; who, though the appearance of the angels to them at the sepulchre was after the two Marys and Salome were gone from thence, yet brought the news of it to the disciples before Mary Magdalene, and those to whom Jesus appeared, arrived with the account that they had seen the Lord. For notwithstanding it is certain that Mary Magdalene on Christ's appearing to her went and acquainted the disciples with it (Mark xvi. 10, and John xx. 18), yet, as they might be now assembled together by Peter and John at a different place from that where she met with Peter before, it is no way improbable that by Mary's going to Peter's lodgings, who was now gone to meet the disciples elsewhere, or by some other accident unknown to us, Joanna and those with her might get thither first with the report of their having seen a vision of angels, who had declared that Jesus was alive. Immediately on hearing which, some men (of whom it is probable Peter might be the first) went away to the sepulchre, and found things in the same order as the women said, but had no sight of Jesus. On whose return these two disciples that were going to Emmaus left the company; and though as they were setting out some might inform that a report was brought by Mary Magdalene and some other women that they had seen the Lord, they might be as backward to believe it, and as ready to impute it to the power of imagination, as those in whose presence the report was made. I am obliged to Mr. West for this view of the matter, which represents it in a clearer light than any other scheme proposed before. (See West's Observ. p. 106, 197.)
He opens what the scriptures had foretold of Christ;

laid in order there; but him they did not see: though we are informed that since we left the company some women have come to them, who affirm that he has actually appeared to them himself, and declared that he was risen, and would shew himself to his disciples: but still we have received no certain proof of it ourselves, so that as yet we know not what to think of it, and cannot but be under great concern about it.

25 And upon this our Lord, without discovering who he was, said to them with some warmth, O ye thoughtless [creatures] and slow of heart to believe all the things that the prophets have so frequently and clearly spoken; which, if you had attentively considered and believed them, would have prevented this surprise! Was it not necessary, in order to accomplish those sacred oracles, which testify before-hand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow (1 Pet. i. 11), that the Messiah should suffer all these things, at which you are so much stumbled, and [so] by rising from the dead should enter into his glory?

26 And hereupon beginning from the writings of Moses, and supporting his discourse with the authority of all the prophets, he interpreted to them, in a much clearer light than they had ever seen them in before, *the principal things which either

1 O thoughtless creatures, &c.] The word creatures is by no means so bad a sound as that of fools, by which we translate it: (see note m on Mat. v. 22, Vol. I. p. 208.) Yet, as Dr. Bullock justly observes (in his Vindication of Christ's Resurrection, p. 174), if the prophecies of the Old Testament had been (as Mr. Collins pretends) only allegorical, there could not have been room for such a heavy charge of stupidity against these disciples for not understanding them. It is, by the way, very weak in Mr. Collins, and some other divines, to urge the sense of Christ's friends to believe his resurrection, as an argument that the proofs of it were defective; on the contrary, as Bishop Chandler well replies (in his Vindication of Christianity, p. 45, 46), their believing afterwards carries the greater weight; for it removes all suspicion of a collusion between Christ and them in his lifetime: and also implies an impartial examination of the fact, and the strength of those proofs that vanquished this incredulity.

2 Beginning from Moses, and all the prophets.] It is no way necessary (with Mr. Mede in his ingenious discourse on these words) to suppose that Christ's sufferings, resurrection, and exaltation, are each of them distinctly foretold in each of those parts of the sacred writings which are mentioned here. It is enough, if Moses gives some intimations concerning him, which succeeding prophets carry on; and if, when all their testimonies are taken together, all these events are expressed by some one or other of them. It was very unbecoming the character of an honest writer to represent our Lord as here attempting to prove his resurrection from scripture; which Mr. Collins pretends to have been the case. The precise point in view plainly was to convince them that there was no reason to be scandalized at the death of one whom they took to be the Messiah; nor in general to look on the report of his resurrection as a monstrous and incredible tale. But that he was actually risen was to be proved another way: which accordingly our Lord immediately used by discovering himself to them. They either had been typified or were foretold concerning him in all the scriptures.

And by this time they drew near to the village whither they were travelling; and when they came to the house where they designed to tarry, 28 Jesus, like one that was a stranger, began to take his leave; and making no offer to turn in with them, he seemed as if he were going farther, intending indeed to do it, if he were not prevented by their request. But they even compelled him by their friendly importunity to go in with them, saying, Let us prevail upon you to continue this night with us, where we assure you of a most hearty welcome; and as indeed we are so greatly delighted and edified with your company, that we cannot part with you, it may also be inconvenient for you to travel much farther; for it is now towards evening, and the day declines apace. And he complied with their request, and went in to continue with them.

And it came to pass, as he sat down to table with them, he took a cake of bread; and though he only appeared as a guest there, he assumed the office of the head of the family, and looking up to heaven blessed, or gave thanks over it; and then brake it, and gave [it] to them, just in the manner he had formerly been used to.

And they were so surprised at this instance, that they now looked upon him more intently than they had done before; and their eyes were then opened, and, to their utterable astonishment and joy, they knew him, and plainly saw that it was Jesus their dear Master; and as they were preparing to acknowledge him as such, he suddenly became invisible, and withdrew himself from before them in a moment.

And they compelled him, &c. It might be rendered, they pressed him: (see note on Luke xiv. 25, p. 27.) Every body easily sees how little room there was for any proper compulsion in such a case as this. Probably one of them dwelt at Emmaus, or they were going to an inn, or to some friend's house, where they could use the freedom to introduce this unknown stranger, for whom they had so high a veneration.

Their eyes were opened. I see no reason to conclude (with Cruickshank and Bengenius) that his undertaking this office of breaking bread, or (with others) that some peculiar action or gesture in performing it, was the thing that made the discovery, (See note b on ver. 16.) The evangelist strongly intimates that the marvellous influence, which before prevented their knowing him, was removed, though the other circumstances mentioned might awaken them to more attentive observation.

Became invisible, and withdrew himself from before them. Erasmus justly observes that the word vanished leads the mind to think of the person vanishing as a mere science; he would therefore render spetibus, as we have done. Beza also observes that as was more expressive than was, and signifies our Lord being separated from them by a swift and sudden motion.

And
And they said one to another, How strange is it that we should discover him no sooner! Sure we might easily have known him, even by that inimitable spirit and energy in his discourses, so peculiar to himself; for did not our very hearts glow, and burn within us, while he was talking to us by the way, and while he was opening the scriptures to us?

And they were not able to conceal such good news, or to defer the publication of that which would give their brethren such a holy transport as they felt in their own breasts; and therefore, late as it was, they presently rose up from their unfinished meal that very hour, and with cheerful speed returned to Jerusalem, and told it to the rest of their companions (compare Mark xiv. 13, p. 455); among whom they had soon after the pleasure of seeing their Lord again in the manner related in the next section.

IMPROVEMENT.

How delightful a close of so melancholy a day to these pious travellers! a day surely long to be remembered by them and by us! They were on a journey; but they did not amuse themselves on it with any trifling subject of discourse. Their hearts were set upon Christ, and therefore their tongues were employed in speaking of him. And behold, Christ himself, the dear theme of their discourse, makes one among them; he enlightens their eyes and warms their hearts, and at length makes himself known to them in the breaking of bread.

So may we often be speaking of Christ, from the fulness of our hearts, when we go out, and when we come in! So may he still, in some degree, join himself with us in spirit, guiding our souls into Divine knowledge, and animating them with holy love!

They bear an honourable and a just testimony to that great Prophet whom God had raised up for them, as mighty before him both in word and deed. But they knew not how to see through so dark a cloud: their hopes were almost extinguished, and they could only say, We trusted this had been he that should have redeemed Israel. Pitiable weakness! Yet too just an emblem of the temper which often prevails in the pious mind; when the Christian is ready to give up all, if deliverance does not proceed just in the method he expected. Yet was Christ even then delivering Israel.

[1 Did not our hearts burn within us?] This reading is far more expressive, as well as far more authentic, than that of some copies, which, instead of νομισματικος here, have νομισματικος. Was not our heart veiled? &c.—Compare Psal. xxxix. 3, and Jer. xx. 9.
Israel in the most glorious and effectual manner, by those very sufferings which gave them such distress. Verily thou art the God of Israel, and the Saviour, when thou art a God that hidest thyself from us. (Isa. xlv. 15.)

In faithful friendship, and with a plainness well becoming his office, the compassionate Redeemer upbraids them with their slowness of heart to believe these things, when they had received line upon line, precept upon precept, concerning them. How justly do we fall under such a rebuke in many instances! Let us then humbly say, Lord, increase our faith!

We should reasonably have thought ourselves happy in an opportunity of hearing or reading this discourse of Jesus, in which he threw such lustre on the prophecies of the Old Testament, and proved that, according to the tenor of them, it was necessary that the Messiah should thus suffer, and so enter into his glory. As Providence has denied us this satisfaction, let us however improve this general and very important hint, that Moses and all the prophets speak of these things. Let us delight to trace the heavenly beam from its earliest dawn, and to observe how it grew brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. May the blessed Spirit, by whom those mysterious predictions were inspired, so direct our inquiries, that every veil may be taken off from our eyes, that we may see Jesus in the Old Testament as well as in the New; and see him in both with that lively fervour of holy affection which may cause our hearts to burn within us! And oh, that we may especially find that, when we surround his table, he makes himself known to us in the breaking of bread, in such a manner, as to fill our souls with all joy, as well as peace in believing! (Rom. xv. 13.)

SECT. CXCVIII.

The two disciples return to make their report to the apostles; and while they are together, Jesus appears to them the evening after his resurrection. Mark XVI. 14. Luke XXIV. 33.—43. John XX. 19—23.

LUKE XXIV.—33.

And [they] found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, and the other disciple, to whom Jesus discovered himself at Emmaus, that they immediately arose and returned to Jerusalem, to communicate the joyful news to their brethren there. And now when they came thither, they found the eleven apostles assembled, and others with them, who,

* They found the eleven apostle assembled. [As Paul (1 Cor. xv. 5) calls the company of the apostles the twelve, though Judas, the twelfth person, was dead; so Luke here who, before these two could begin their story, were eager on their part to inform the travellers of the satisfaction they had received since they went out: So that, as soon as they appeared, they heard several of the company saying, as with one voice, O brethren, here are good tidings, which will make your hearts leap within you; for the Lord is risen indeed, and has himself appeared to Simon Peter, who is here present to testify the truth of it.

And the two travellers declared how easily they could believe it, and recounted the things [which had happened] to them in the way to Emmaus; and how, after many wise and affectionate discourses, he was at last known by them in the breaking of bread, as they were sitting down to supper. But notwithstanding these repeated testimonies of the resurrection of Christ, yet there were some in the company whose prejudices were so strong, and their faith so weak, that they did not believe either Peter or them (compare Mark xvi. 13, p. 455), though most of them were convinced (as they had just declared) that the Lord was risen indeed.

And quickly afterwards, as they were speaking of these things among themselves while they were sitting at supper, [Jesus] himself appeared to the eleven, who were then altogether, except one of them. And this appearance was attended with some remarkable circumstances, which shall now be related.

It was then on the evening of the same day on which he rose from the dead, [which was], as we have before observed, the first day of the week, even here calls them the eleven, though Thomas, the eleventh person, was absent, as evidently appears from John xx. 24, in the next section.

b And has appeared to Simon Peter.] None of the evangelists mention any thing of the circumstances of the appearance to Peter; but it has been observed before (note a, sect. exviii. p. 454.) that the apostle Paul expressly refers to it, 1 Cor. xv. 5. —The same apostle likewise mentions an appearance of Christ to James, (ibid. ver. 7.) Yet, as nothing is said of his having seen him that day, it much diminishes the credit of the story which Jerom gives us from the gospel of the Nazoreans, that James had vowed to eat nothing after the paschal supper, till Jesus arose; on which account our Lord appeared first to him. None of the apostles seem to have had such a firm expectation of Christ's resurrection as must have been the foundation of such a vow: and the order in which Paul mentions his appearance to James does very ill suit with this story. —Probably Peter was the first man, as Mary Magdalene was the first woman, that was favoured with the view of our risen Saviour.

c Some—did not believe, &c.] Mark expresses it in a general way (chap. xvi. 13) that they went and told it unto the residue: neither believed they them: but we are undoubtedly to understand these words with such a limitation as in the paraphrase. See note e on Mark xvi. 12, p. 454; and note f on Mat. xvi. sect. xvi.

and the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus [himself, and stood in the midst [of them], and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. [Luke xxiv. — 36.]

Luke XXIV. 37. But they were terrified and afraid, and supposed that they had seen a spirit.

33 And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts?

39 Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and even when the doors of the room, where the disciples were gathered together, were shut, and fastened on the inside, for fear of the Jews; as they did not know but some officers of the high priest might come to apprehend them, on the scandalous pretence that they had stolen away the body, which was now publicly laid to their charge: it was, I say, at this time and place that Jesus himself on a sudden came in, opening the locks or bolts by a miraculous power; and he stood in the midst of them in his usual form, and said to them, with a mild voice and a gracious aspect, All peace and happiness be unto you; thereby graciously intimating that he forgave their former cowardice, and would still continue to treat them as his friends, though they knew in their own consciences they had of late believed themselves in a manner unworthy of that character and relation.

But they were greatly amazed and terrified at this sudden unexpected appearance; and as they knew the doors of the room were shut, and in the present hurry of their thoughts did not immediately reflect upon the proofs he had so often given of his Divine power, or on the evidences they had but just before received of his resurrection, some of them suspected that what they saw was only a spirit, or a mere airy phantom, and not a real body.

And he said to them, Why are you thus perplexed and troubled at the sight of me, and why do these doubtful and unreasonable suspicions arise in your hearts, as if it only were the appearance of a spirit that you have here before you? Behold my hands and my feet, which for your satisfaction still retain the scars of those wounds which I received on the cross, to convince you that it is myself, and no other: handle me,

...Jesus himself came in, opening the locks or bolts by a miraculous power.]
He eats with them, and upbraids them with their unbelief.

And saying this, he showed them his hands and his feet, and even the mark which the spear had left in his side, which appeared like a large wound, newly, though perfectly, healed: and several of them, and among the rest John the beloved apostle, who records this circumstance, had the curiosity particularly to examine it. (Compare 1 John i. 1). And the disciples therefore were exceeding glad, as it might reasonably be expected they should be, when they thus saw the Lord, and learnt by such infallible tokens that he was really alive.

And for their further satisfaction, when [some of them] were so transported, that they as yet believed not their own eyes for joy, and were so astonished that they hardly knew where they were, he said to them, Have ye any food here left, that I may eat with you? And they gave him such as they had, even part of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb, on which they had been supping just before. And taking [it], he eat before them, that thus they might be fully satisfied that he was actually alive, and had a true and real body. (Compare Acts x. 41.)

And when he had for a while gently upbraided and reproved them for their unbelief, and for the hardness of their hearts, that they had not believed the repeated testimony of those who had already seen him since he was risen from the dead, and that, even after his own appearance to them, they should be capable of entertaining any further doubts; Then, that they might be satisfied that he had graciously forgiven them, Jesus said to them again, Peace be unto you: may all prosperity and happiness attend you! As [my] Father sent me, and gave me authority to act in his name, so also I send you to act as my apostles, under the important character of my ambassadors to the children of men.

And see: for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have.

And when he had thus spoken, he showed them his hands and his feet, and his side.] [John xx. 20.—]

And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here any meat?

And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb. And he took it and did eat before them,

And [he] upbraided them with their unbelief, and hardness of heart, because they believed not whom they had seen him after he was risen.

Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you.
And when he had said this, he breathed upon [them], and said to them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost.

23 Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.

And saying this, he in a solemn manner breathed upon [them], and said to them as one that had Divine authority, Receive ye the Holy Spirit, and take this as an earnest of what you shall further receive not many days hence: for thus will I shortly breathe out the miraculous influences of my spirit upon you, in a greater abundance than you have ever yet received them, to qualify and furnish you for this important office. In consequence of which, whose soever sins you shall remit, or shall declare to be forgiven, they are remitted and forgiven to them; [and] whose soever sins you shall retain, or shall pronounce to be unpardoned, they are assuredly retained, and their guilt lies upon them: for you shall have a power, not only of declaring what is lawful or unlawful under the gospel-dispensation, but also of sending or removing miraculous punishments, and of discerning the spirits of men in such perfection, as to be able with certainty to declare to particular persons in question, whether they be, or be not, in a state of pardon and acceptance with God. (See notes on Mat. xvi. 19. Vol. I. p. 463.)

And after this discourse with his disciples, at his first appearance to them, Jesus departed from them for that time, and left them to spend the rest of the evening in those delightful exercises of devotion which this great occasion had so natural a tendency to inspire.

IMPROVEMENT.

With pleasure let us echo back the words of the apostle, and join in that glad anthem which so well suits a resurrection-day, The Lord is risen; he is risen indeed. We owe our daily praises to God for the abundant demonstration he has given us of so important a fact, for every appearance of Christ to his disciples, and for all the infallible tokens by which he shewed himself to be alive after his passion. (Acts i. 3.)

He came with peace and blessings in his mouth; he came to disperse their fears, and to assure them of his forgiving love. How strong were those prejudices which so hardly yielded to such convincing proofs? And how rich was that grace which condescended to overcome them!

Christ breathed on the apostles, that they might receive the Holy Spirit. May he also breathe on our souls, and fill us with that glorious and Divine gift, which, if it qualified the apostles for their extraordinary office, may much more furnish us for the common duties of life! May we try our state by the characters which they have laid down in their inspired writings; in which sense, among others, we may assure ourselves, that, if they have declared our sins to be remitted, they are remitted: and, if indeed they are so, we need not to be much concerned by whom they are retained. Vain and arrogant men may claim a despotic power, which God never gave, and which these words are far from implying. But, whatsoever be the sentence they may pass, they whom God blesseth, are blessed indeed. (1 Chron. xvii. 27.) May we always esteem it a very small thing to be judged of man's judgment, (1 Cor. iv. 3) pitying, rather than resenting, the rashness of those who claim any such discretionary sacerdotal power as can give the real penitent any alarm, or the impenitent any encouragement to continue in sin!

SECT. CXCIX.

Christ appears to the eleven a second time, a week after the former; particularly offering to Thomas, who had before been absent, the most sensible proofs of his resurrection. John XX. 24—29.

John XX. 24. We mentioned in the last section Christ's appearing to his disciples on the evening of that day on which he arose; but it is farther to be observed, that Thomas one of the twelve, who was also called Didymus, or the twin-brother, was not with them at that time when Jesus came. The other disciples therefore, as soon as they met with him, told him in a transport of joy, We have seen the Lord with our own eyes, and consequently can have no farther doubt of the truth of his resurrection, for he has condescended to shew us the very marks of those wounds he received on the cross. But he said to them, This is a matter of too great importance for me to believe on any report, even on yours; and more is necessary to convince me of the truth of it, than merely a transient sight of mine own eyes: for unless I shall evidently see in his hands, as you say you have done, the marks of the nails, and, more than that, shall put my finger upon the very individual mark of the nails, and put my hand upon the very scar made by

\[\text{And shall put my finger upon the mark of the nails.}\]

I am sensible it might seem more elegant, with the Prussian Translators, to wave the repetition and to render it, and put my finger into it; but, on farther reflection, there seems to be a beauty in 26 And after eight days again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them: then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you.

27 Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing.

28 And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord, and my God.

in this repetition which admirably represents the language of a positive man, declaring again and again what he insisted upon; which I have therefore endeavoured to express in the paraphrase, in terms which such persons often use.

b And put my hand upon his side.] So I would choose to render it, rather than into his side; agreeable to Dr. Stevenson's just criticism, that up here signifies upon; as 16, την γαρ (John viii. 6.) is upon the ground; and 16, την γαρ αὐτοῦ (Luke xvi. 22.) upon his hand. See Dr. Stevenson against Woodrow on Christ's miracles, p. 524.

c Reach forth thy finger hither, &c.] It is observable, that Spinoza himself could find no more plausible objection against this evidence of the resurrection of Christ, than to say, that the disciples were deceived in what they imagined they saw, heard, and felt, (Vie de Spinoza, p. 52.) which, if granted, would be in effect to allow that no men could be competent judges of any fact whatsoever relating to their own sensations, and consequently would overthrow all human testimony in courts of judicature and elsewhere.

d Instead of entering on any farther scrutiny.] It is not said that he actually touched the wounds; and our Lord afterwards says, (ver. 22) that his belief was built on sight; which seems to intimate that this resuscitation of our Lord, together with the additional evidence arising from the knowledge which he plainly had of that unreasonable demand which Thomas had made in his absence, quite overcame him: a turn of mind exceeding natural to so frank a temper as that of Thomas appears to have been.
I do not only now acknowledge thee to be Jesus my Lord, infallibly risen from the dead, but I confess thy Divine knowledge and power, and prostrate myself before thee, as the great incarnate Deity, the glorious Emmanuel.

29 Jesus says to him, Thomas thou hast believed, because thou hast seen me, and hast received these sensible demonstrations of my resurrection; and it is well: but still more happy are they who have not seen me themselves, and [yet] have believed on the credible testimony of others; for they have shewn a greater degree of candour and humility, which renders the faith it produces so much the more acceptable.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. 5 We most evidently see in this instance of Thomas, as well as in many circumstances of the story mentioned above, how far the apostles were from being rashly credulous in the important fact of Christ's resurrection. It is apparent, they erred in the contrary extreme; yet our gracious Lord condescended to satisfy scruples which were carried to an extravagance. He renewed his visit, and at the same time renewed his salutation too, Peace be unto you was still his language; nor did he only speak, but act, as one who wished it, and was determined to give it.

What peace must it administer to the mind of this good man when his Lord said, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands, and reach hither thine hand, and put it on my side; and be not faithless, but believing! Evidently did he hereby shew, not only that he was risen from the dead, but that he circumstantially knew those events which had passed in his bodily absence, and needed

My Lord, and my God!] The irrefragable argument arising from these words in proof of the deity of our blessed Lord (which so many good writers have stated at large,) cannot be evaded by saying, that these words are only an exclamation of surprise, as if he had said, Good God, is it indeed thus! For it is expressly declared he spoke these words to him; and, no doubt, Christ would severely have reproved him if there had not been just reason to address him thus.

[Happier are they who have not seen, and yet have believed.] If it be queried, Why a greater blessedness is pronounced on those who believe on more slender evidence: it may be answered, that our Lord by no means intended to assert, that every one who believes without seeing, is happier than any one believing on sight; for then the meanest Christian now would be more happy than the greatest of the apostles; but only, that where the effects of that faith were equal, it argued greater simplicity, candour, and wisdom, to yield to reasonable evidence without seeing, than could be argued merely from having believed on sight; after sufficient evidence of another kind had been proposed. It was therefore in effect telling Thomas, It would have been more acceptable to him if he had not stood out so long! and it was doing it in such a manner as would be most calculated for the comfort and encouragement of believers in future ages, to whom, in many of his speeches to the apostles themselves, our Lord expresses a most obliging and affectionate regard.

needed not human information. Let us then ever behave ourselves as in the presence of Christ. Let us act, and speak, and think, in such a manner as may bear his inspection; and, struck with these united demonstrations of wisdom, power and grace, let us prostrate ourselves before him, and say, Our Lord, and our God! thus honouring the Son as we honour the Father (John v. 23), and adoring the indwelling Deity, through this veil of flesh, in which it has been pleased to enshrine itself, and kindly to temper, though not entirely to conceal, its rays.

Though we have not those sensible manifestations which were granted to Thomas, let it suffice us that the apostles were the appointed witnesses of all these things; and what they saw with their eyes, and their hands handled of the word of life, that have they declared unto us (1 John i. 1, 3). Let us thankfully receive so convincing a testimony. Let us shew an upright and candid mind in accepting such evidence as the wisdom of God has seen fit to give us; remembering that a truly rational faith is the more acceptable to God, in proportion to the difficulties which it is able to surmount; and that there are peculiar blessings in store for them who have not seen and yet have believed.

SECT. CC.

Christ discovers himself to Peter and several other disciples at the sea of Tiberias, while they were fishing there. John XXI. 1—14.

JOHN XXI. 1.

AFTER these things, Jesus shewed himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias: and on this wise shewed he himself:

2 There were together Simon Peter, and Thomas called Didymus, and Nathaniel of Cana,

* Some time after these things.] Grotius thinks this whole chapter was written by some elder of the church of Ephesus, and added to the rest of the book by the approbation of that society, as agreeable to the relations which they had heard from the mouth of St. John; and Le Clerc follows him in this conjecture; but Dr. Mill has taken pains to invalidate it (Prolegom. p. 249); and the beginning of ver. 24 destroys the force of Grotius’s argument from the latter part of it. See note on that verse, at the close of the next section.

b Nathaniel

foregoing history, and also the [two sons] of Zebedee, James and John, and two other of his disciples with them, were one day together in Galilee; whether they were returned by Christ's direction, to wait for the accomplishment of what he had promised, that they should see him on a certain mountain in those parts, and where they expected in a few days to meet with most of their brethren. (Compare Mat. xxviii. ver. 7, 10. sect. cxcv. and ver. 16. sect. cci.) And while they were thus waiting, Simon Peter, that their time might not lie on their hands, and that he might make some provision for his own support, and for the entertainment of his friends, says to them, I will go a fishing; and they say to him, We also will go along with thee, and give thee what assistance we can. They went out therefore, and immediately took ship, and spent not only that evening, but all the following night, in throwing their nets; but though it was the properest time for fishing, yet they caught nothing worth the mentioning.

4 And when the morning was now come, Jesus appeared and stood upon the shore; nevertheless, the disciples, who had no expectation of seeing him there, being at some distance from him, and it not being yet perfectly light, knew not that it was Jesus. Then as they approached within call, Jesus said unto them, Have you any thing to eat, my lads? or have you taken fish enough to furnish out a meal? They answered him, No; we have been toiling here all night in vain. And he said to them, Let me then advise you to throw the net on the right side of the ship, and you will undoubtedly find [some]. And, willing to try at least whether this stranger conjectured right, they

3 Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also go with thee. They went forth, and entered into a ship immediately; and that night they caught nothing.

4 But when the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore; but the disciples knew not that it was Jesus.

5 Then Jesus saith unto them, Children, have ye any meat? They answered him, No.

6 And he said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They

b Nathaniel of Cana in Galilee. There is no doubt but this Nathaniel is the person mentioned before, John i. 45.—Dr. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Mat. x. 5.) Mr. Fleming (Christol. Vol. II. p. 176), and some others, take him to have been Bartholomew the apostle; but I think they give no convincing reason for that opinion.

c Two other of his disciples. It is indeed uncertain who these two disciples were; though Dr. Lightfoot conjectures they were Andrew and Philip (Hor. Heb. in loc.), which is not improbable, as they were both inhabitants of Bethsaida, near the sea of Tiberias. (John i. 44.) It is however a strange argument against it, to say that John must be one, though he is not here mentioned, when he is so well known to have been one of the sons of Zebedee, who are numbered here among those that were present.

I will go a fishing. It appears from this story, that several of the apostles were now returned to Galilee, where Christ had appointed to meet them; which shews that the discourse (Luke xxiv. 49, sect. cci.) in which our Lord commanded them to continue at Jerusalem till the Holy Ghost fell upon them, must come in after this chapter, and not before it, as it is placed in many harmonies.
He fills their nets, and they discover who he was.

They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes.

7. Therefore that disciple whom Jesus loved, saith unto Peter, It is the Lord. Now when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his fisher's coat unto him (for he was naked,) and did cast himself into the sea.

8 And the other disciples came in a little ship, (for they were not far from land, but as it were two hundred cubits,) dragging the net with fishes.

9 As soon then as they were come to land, they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread.

10 Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish which ye have now caught.

11 Simon Peter went up, and drew the net to land full of great fishes, an hundred and fifty \[\text{They were not able to draw it up into the ship again, &c.} \] This was not merely a demonstration of the power of our Lord, but a kind providential supply for them and their families, which might be of service to them when they waited afterwards in Jerusalem according to his order: and it was likewise a sort of emblematical representation of the great success which should attend their attempts to catch men in the net of the gospel. Compare Luke v. 9, 10. Vol. I. p. 188.

\[\text{In a manner naked, having nothing on but his inner-garment.} \] It is of great importance, in order to vindicate several stories in scripture, which the ignorance or malice of some modern writers has charged with indecency, to observe, that among the Jews (as Grotius and many others have shown) they were said to be naked who had only an under garment on. Compare 1 Sam. xix. 24, 2 Sam. vi. 20, Isa. xx. 3, and Acts xix. 16.
which, upon taking the number of them, they found to be no less than an hundred and fifty-three; and though they were so many and so great, yet the net was not broke.

12 Then Jesus said to them, Come, [and] refresh yourselves, after the fatigue you have had for so many hours. And none of the disciples presumed to ask him, Who art thou? or took upon them to inquire how he came thither, or whence he procured the provision he then offered them?
well knowing that it was the Lord, though he conversed with them in something of a distant manner; but left him to proceed in his own way, as judging it most respectful to leave it to him to direct the discourse to more intimate and particular subjects, in such a manner, and by such degrees, as he should think fit; which he presently after did.

13 Jesus therefore came and took bread, as the master of the feast, and, having blessed it, as he used to do, gave [it] to each of them: and likewise gave them some of the broiled fish.

14 And this was now the third time that Jesus shewed himself to such a number of his disciples at once, after he was risen from the dead; and it was attended with some very remarkable and instructive circumstances, which will be particularly mentioned in the next section.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. CHRIST first called these disciples when they were employed 1,3 in the duties of their proper profession in life, and he now manifests himself to them while they were so engaged; perhaps particularly

*Come and refresh yourselves.] So I choose to render the word *αναζητησαν, rather than *dine; as Homer sometimes uses *εστι to signify a morning's meal.

The third time he shewed himself to such a number, &c. Gronus explains this of the third day of his appearance; for he had first appeared to several on the day of his resurrection; then, after eight days, he came to his disciples, when Thomas was present; and now again, he shewed himself at the sea of Tiberias. And it is plainly necessary that the words should be understood with some such *limitation, to make them consistent with the accounts given by the other evangelists and St. Paul; which, when laid together, will prove, that this was indeed at least the seventh appearance that Jesus had made since his resurrection. For he appeared first to Mary Magdalene (Mark xvi. 9.) and then to the women as they returned from the sepulchre (Mat. xxviii. 9.) after this he was seen of Peter (1 Cor. xv. 5.) and then the same day by the two disciples that were going to Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 13—31.) and again the same evening he appeared to the disciples when Thomas was absent (John xx. 19.) on that day sevennight he appeared to the eleven when Thomas was with them (John xx. 26.) and now after these things he shewed himself a seventh time to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias (John xxii. 1.)—But, as John had particularly mentioned before the two appearances which Jesus made to his disciples when they were together (John xx. 19, 26.) it seems most reasonable to conclude, that he reckons this the third as referring to these.
particularly intending thereby to encourage an honest industry in which indeed we are far more likely to enjoy his presence, and to converse with him, than when we throw away our time in idleness and inactivity.

A while he leaves them to labour in vain, that when the plentiful draught of fishes came, it might be the more remarkable. Sometimes he may deal thus with his ministers, in their endeavours to catch men; that we may be convinced thereby, to whose power we owe our success, and may not sacrifice to our own net, or burn incense to our own drag. (Hab. i. 16.)

All the disciples rejoiced at his appearance; but Peter was the foremost to cast himself at his feet. Conscious that so much had been forgiven him, he is solicitous to shew that he loves much. (Luke vii. 47.) So may the remembrance of our miscarriages work upon us, to make us more vigorous in Christ's service, and to inspire us with such zeal and affection as many waters may not be able to quench, nor the floods to drown! (Cant. viii. 7.)

Let us not imagine this miracle was merely intended for a demonstration of Christ's Divine power over all that passeth through the paths of the sea (Psal. viii. 8); it was also the work of wisdom and bounty. By the sale of so many large and fine fishes a seasonable provision was made for the subsistence of his disciples at Jerusalem, while they were there waiting for the descent of the Spirit. (Luke xxiv. 49.) Let every circumstance of this kind encourage us to trust him, as the Lord of nature and of grace, who will withhold from us no necessary supply of either, while we are making it our humble and faithful care to promote his glory.

SECT. CCI.

Christ discourses with Peter at the sea of Tiberias, and gives a remarkable prophecy concerning the death of that apostle. John XXI. 15—24.

When therefore they had made a plentiful meal on this kind provision which Jesus had supplied them with, there happened some circumstances in his succeeding discourse with his disciples which may be worthy of more distinct notice; and particularly this: Jesus said to Simon Peter, Simon [son] of Jonas dost thou love me more than these do? Or wilt thou now main-

Dost thou love me more than these do?] The original words ἐ Diagram, are ambiguous; and, besides the sense I have given them, they might signify, Dost thou love maintain that thou hast such a zealous regard for me above any of thy brethren, as thou once didst profess, when thou saist, that though all should forsake me, thou wouldst not do it? (Mat. xxvi. 33, p. 343.) He saith unto him, Yea, Lord thou knowest that I love thee sincerely, though I presume not to say more than any of my brethren. [Jesus] said to him, If so, feed my lambs; and as I shall favour thee so far as to commit my church, in part, to thy apostolic care, remember that the most acceptable way of expressing thy love to me will be by taking care even of the weakest and feeblest of my flock.

And, to impress this with the greater force upon his mind, he says to him again the second time, Simon [son] of Jonas, dost thou indeed love me? He answers him as he had done before, Yea, Lord, I appeal to thee for the sincerity of that regard which I have to thee, thou knowest that I truly love thee. [Jesus] says to him again, Feed then my sheep with tenderness and care, and thereby demonstrate the truth of thine affection to me.

And, that it might never be forgot by him, or any that were present, he says to him the third time, Simon [son] of Jonas, wilt thou abide by what thou hast said? Dost thou truly love me, and love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs.

He saith to him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my sheep.

He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved, because.
Peter is told by what death he shall glorify God.

and will that love of thine bear the severest trial? Peter was exceedingly grieved, that he said to him the third time, Dost thou love me? And he said to him with great earnestness, My word. Lord, thou knowest all things; thou seest the very hearts of men, and, seeing mine, thou knowest that I do indeed love thee; though my late lamentable fall might justly bring it into question, and my repeated denial of thee renders me worthy of such a rebuke as this repeated inquiry implies. Jesus says to him, Well, Peter, I acknowledge thou dost indeed love me, and know how to distinguish between frailty and treachery; and therefore I not only own thee as a disciple, but confirm thee in thine apostolic office, again requiring thee to feed my sheep; and be assured, that I consider thy zeal for the edification and comfort of my church, as the most acceptable token thou canst possibly give of thy love to me.

And indeed thou shalt approve that love, not only by labours, but by sufferings too: for verily, verily, I say unto thee, and would have thee to remember it as what shall surely come to pass, that when thou wast a young man, thou didst gird thyself, and walk about without control whithersoever thou wouldst; but when thou art grown old, thou shalt stretch out thine hands, and another shall gird thee, as a helpless prisoner, and at length shall carry thee whither thou wouldst not naturally incline to go, even to those sufferings to which flesh and blood have the strongest aversion: yet I know that, notwithstanding thy late miscarriage, thy love to me will bear thee through all.

And this he said, signifying and intimating by what kind of death he should glorify God: namely, that he should suffer martyrdom, and die with his hands stretched out on a cross. And, having said this, yet farther to illustrate and explain it, he says to him, Follow me then, as I now walk along, and shew that thou art willing to conform to my example, and to follow me even to the death of the cross.

And Peter did so with great alacrity; but turning about, he saw that other disciple whom Jesus loved, 18 Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldst: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not.

19 This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God. And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, Follow me.

20 Then Peter turning about, seeth the disciple whom Jesus loved,

* When thou art grown old.] Peter's crucifixion is said to have happened about forty years after this; but the time is not exactly and certainly known.

Silently
Peter inquires what should become of John.

John XXI. 20.

Jesus loved, silently following him, in humble token of his readiness likewise to suffer the greatest extremities in the service of so dear a Master. Now, by the way, it may be recollected, that this was the apostle John, for whom our Lord had a peculiar kindness, who also at the paschal supper lay in his bosom, and said to him, Lord, is he that will betray thee? (See John xiii. 23, p. 286.) Peter therefore observing this disciple, and seeing him follow Jesus in the same manner as he did himself, though he was not called to it, says unto Jesus, Lord, what shall this man [do], and what is to become of him? Must he, who is now following with me, partake of the like sufferings, and in like manner testify his love by dying for thee?

22 Jesus says to him, Is that any immediate concern of thine, Peter? If I will that he tarry, or continue alive, till I come in power and great glory to execute the judgment I have threatened on mine enemies, what [is that] to thee, or to any one else? Follow thou me: mind thou thine own duty, and endeavour to prepare for thine own sufferings; and pray not with a vain curiosity into secret events which may befal him, or any other of thy brethren.

23 Now as this answer was not rightly understood, this saying therefore went abroad among the brethren, or the other followers of Christ, that this disciple should not die: and the advanced age to which he lived gave some farther colour for it: but it was entirely built upon a mistake; for Jesus did not say to him, or of him, that he should not die; but only, as it was expressed

4 Silently following him, in humble token of his readiness, &c.] There is a spirit and tenderness in this plain passage which I can never read without the most sensible emotion. Christ orders Peter to follow him, in token of his readiness to be crucified in his cause. John stays not for the call; he rises, and follows too; but he says not one word of his love and his zeal. He chose that the action only should speak that; and when he records this circumstance, he tells us not what that action meant; but with great simplicity relates the fact only. If here and there a generous heart that, like his own, glows with love to Christ, sees and emulates it, be it so; but he is not solicitous men should admire it. It was addressed to his Master: and it was, enough that he understood it.—And can any one be himself base enough to imagine that such a man could spend his life in promoting a pernicious falsehood (for such in the second edition of the ninth of my ten sermons I largely prove the apostolic testimony to be, if it were a falsehood), and at last, in his old age, when his relish for everything but goodness and immortality was gone, would so solemnly attest it, as he does in the conclusion of his gospel? May God deliver every one that reads this from a head so fatallie beclouded by the corruptions of the heart!

* This saying therefore went abroad among the brethren, &c.] That there was such a notion and tradition among the ancients, Fabricius has particularly shewn, Cod. Apor. Not. Test. Vol. II. p. 533.
Atic1. John, and his testimony is true. pressed before. If I will that he tarry, or continue alive, till I come, what [is that] to thee?

And this is the disciple who testifies concerning these things, and hath written them as above: and since he was an eye-witness to them, and has not failed, in a proper manner, to produce in the churches the credentials necessary to prove the veracity and exactness of his writings, we certainly know that his testimony is true, and doubt not but every candid reader will receive it accordingly.'

IMPROVEMENT.

What if our Lord Jesus Christ should put the same question to us that he did to Peter, in this remarkable passage, and should thus repeat it again and again? Are there none of us who should be at a loss for an answer? None of us to whom he might say, I know that you have not the love of Christ in you?—Or are there none of us who apprehend, that, if we had ourselves been thus pressed, we could, at the very best, only have said, Lord, thou that knowest all things, knowest that I cannot tell whether I love thee or not?—Blush, and be confounded, O my soul, if thou must reply with such uncertainty to a question of so great importance, and in a case where all the ardour of the heart might be so justly expected!

But are there not still some of us who through Divine grace could reply with pleasure, Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that, notwithstanding all the unallowed and lamented infirmities of our lives, we do indeed love thee?—And, if we are thus really conscious to ourselves of such an unfeigned affection, let it be our daily joy, that he who implanted this Divine principle in our hearts, discerns and sees it there, and, knowing all things, he perfectly knows this, however we may be suspected, however we may be censured.

Let us learn also by what method we are to express our love, according to our ability and opportunity; even by feeding his sheep

* We know that his testimony is true.] Grosset would argue from the plural number in these words (Annot. in John xx.
30.) that this last chapter was not written by John himself, but was added to his gospel by some other hands. (See note * on John xxi. 1. p. 471.) But it is plainly said in the beginning of this verse, that it was he who testified and wrote these things; and besides, that we have frequent instances of the like change of numbers (see Rom. vii. 14. and 1 Thess. ii. 18.) it is evident from the words, I suppose, in the next verse, that only one person speaks. So that no more appears to be intended here than if he had said, "We universally allow, that what is testified by a credible eye-witness, and asserted by him under his hand, must be admitted as a valid testimony, and pass for unexceptionable evidence: this is the case here; and therefore regard it accordingly."
Jesus appears to five hundred brethren in Galilee:

Sect. CCI. sheep, and promoting the interest and edification of his church. Let ministers especially do it; and let them not forget those dear creatures, the lambs of the flock. Jesus the compassionate Shepherd, as we see, did not forget them; but taught his servants with the greatest tenderness both by his precepts, and by his example, to gather them in their arms, and carry them in their bosom. (Isa. xli. 11.)

21 Happy are those ministers who, instead of indulging a vain curiosity in things wherein they are not at all, or but very little concerned; are spending their lives in such faithful services; feeding the flock of God; and taking the oversight of it, not by constraint but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; that when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they may receive an un-fading crown of glory: (1 Pet. v. 2, 4.) A crown which will infinitely more than repay, not only their labours, but their sufferings too!

18 Happy Peter, who, having worn out his better years in the service of Christ, courageously stretched out his aged arms to be bound, and, being borne away to tortures and death, shed the last slow ebb of his blood as a martyr for him who had loved him and given himself for him.—And not less happy the beloved disciple, so willing to hazard his life in the same cause; though he was not in fact called to lay it down as a martyr! Our gracious Lord, who sees every purpose, and every affection, as it rises in the heart, favourably accepts of the willing mind, and will, through the riches of his grace, entitle them to the reward of equal suffering, who have waited with a like readiness, though they have not been called out to the severity of the like trial.

SECT. CCI.

Christ appears to the whole body of the disciples at the appointed mountain in Galilee, and afterwards meets the apostles several times at Jerusalem, and discourses with them concerning the affairs of his kingdom. Mat. XXVIII. 16, to the end. Mark XVI. 15—18. Luke XXIV, 44—49. Acts I.—2, 3.

Mat. XXVIII. 16.

NOW, quickly after the late interview which Jesus had with his disciples at Jerusalem, the eleven disciples went into Galilee, to a certain mountain not far from the sea of Tiberias, where Jesus had appointed to meet them. “And he appeared to them, and above five hundred brethren at once, who came together from all parts of the country on that important occasion.”

And

Mat. XXVIII. 16.

Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them.
And after that, is seen of James, and then of all the apostles. And having seen him, they bowed down and worshipped him; and though some of the company had doubted at first, yet they were afterwards fully convinced. "And the greater part of them continued alive, as witnesses of the truth of his resurrection for several years after; though others of them died in a short time, and went to their glorified and triumphant Lord in heaven." See 1 Cor. xv. 6. Thus did he manifest himself in Galilee to a considerable number of his disciples at once; and after that, he appeared to James, and then (as we shall see hereafter) to all the apostles.” See 1 Cor. xv. 7.

But, though he shewed himself thus openly to his disciples, “he did not publicly appear at any time to all the people; nor indeed did he shew himself, in any other instance, to so large an assembly even of his own disciples: but in the several appearances he made he chiefly conversed with the apostles, and confined his visits to those witnesses that were chosen before by God to attest the truth of his resurrection; who had frequent opportunities of a free conversation with him, and, as we have seen before (Luke xiv. 30, 42, 43; and John xx. 12, 13), did eat and drink with him.

a Though some of the company had doubted at first, &c.] There is no room to think that this refers to some of the apostles, when Christ had so lately satisfied the most incredulous among them; but we are certainly to understand it (as Mr. West has fully shewn) of some that were in company with them, though Matthew has not mentioned them. (See West’s Observ. p. 25, 29.) Yet still it is not easy to imagine how any of the rest of this company could continue to doubt of the truth of Christ’s resurrection when they actually saw him, and that in the presence of so many others; a circumstance incomparably more convincing to each than if he had appeared to any one alone. I therefore chose to render and paraphrase the words, οί δὲ ἐλεφαντάσθησαν, as above. Those learned critics, Albert. (Observ. p. 163, 164), and Mos (Exercit. p. 23), have produced many instances, in which οί is put for τίνες. And all the difficulty is removed, if we allow a small change in the tense, and take the rendering of the peregrination Testament. Even they who had before doubted; or, which is much the same, though some had doubted.

b Several years after.] It is generally granted that the first Epistle to the Corinthians was written at least twenty years after Christ’s resurrection; and Paul there tells us, that the greater part of these five hundred then continued alive. And by the way it was a wise and gracious dispensation of Divine Providence to continue their lives so long, as each of them, wherever Providence led them, would be an authentic witness of that important fact, the resurrection of our Lord, the great fundamental of the Christian faith.

c After that he appeared to James.] It is probable this was James the son of Alphaeus, who was still living when the apostle Paul wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, whereas the other James, the son of Zebedee, had suffered martyrdom some years before. (Acts xii. 2.) But the circumstances of this appearance are no where recorded, nor have we any credible account where or when it happened; only we learn from the order in which it is placed by the apostle Paul, that it was after Christ’s appearance to the five hundred brethren. See note b on Luke xxiv. 34, p. 464.

him after he rose from the dead.” See Acts x. 41.

And at these times of his conversing with them, he more particularly opened to them what was the nature and design of their office; [and] through the Holy Spirit, which was given not by measure to himself, and which he had lately breathed into them, he gave commandments and instructions to the apostles whom he had chosen, how they were to act: To whom also he gave abundant evidences of the truth of his resurrection, and shewed himself to be alive after he had suffered death, by many infallible proofs and tokens; being seen of them at various times for the space of forty days after his resurrection, and speaking to them of the things which related to the kingdom of God.

And these his last interviews with them were chiefly at Jerusalem, to which they returned soon after his appearance to them on the mountain in Galilee; and Jesus also came thither, and made them repeated visits: and on one of these occasions, he spake unto them, saying: These are the words which I spake unto you, and these the intimations that I often gave you, while I was yet dwelling among you, that all the things must be exactly fulfilled which are written in the scriptures concerning me, both in the pentateuch which is called the law of Moses, and in the books of the succeeding prophets, and in the Psalms and other poetical books of the Old Testament.

And at the same time he not only in words expounded to them the sense of the sacred writers, but also by a secret operation on their intellectual faculties opened their minds, that they might understand the scriptures in their reference to him. And in a most convincing manner he enlarged

Acts 1. 2.—[And] through the Holy Ghost [he gave] commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen;

3 To whom also he shewed himself alive after his passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God.

Luke xxiv. 44.—And [Jesus came, and spake unto them, saying]. These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me. [Matt. xxviii. 18.—]

45 Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures,

46 And said unto them,

4 And at these times of his conversing with them.] As I have inserted in the first paragraph of this section what is said in the first epistle to the Corinthians, of our Lord’s appearance to the five hundred brethren, and to James, so I have thought it proper to introduce in this and the next section what relates to this story in the beginning of the Acts (chap. i.—2—12), which renders the narration more complete, and finishes the account which the sacred writers give us of the history of our Lord to the time of his ascension.

c On one of these occasions he spake, enlarged upon the important subject, and said to them, When you consider all these things, you must certainly perceive, that thus it was written, and thus it was necessary, in conformity to XXIV. 46 the counsel of God, and for the manifestation of his glory; that the Messiah should suffer; and should rise again from the dead, as I have done, on the third day; And that, in consequence 47 of this, and on this great foundation, the important doctrines of repentance and forgiveness of sins through faith in him should be preached in his name, and by his authority, to all the nations of the earth, beginning first at Jerusalem itself, though polluted with the blood of the Prince of life.

You know indeed (added he) how cruelly the Jews have treated me, and how ungratefully they have rejected me; but their outrageous malice has now done its utmost, and my heavenly Father has not only rescued me from their hands, but is exalting me to all that height of dignity and glory which the sacred oracles have so pathetically described; for all authority is now given unto me, both in heaven and on earth, and, in accomplishment of what was promised to the Messiah, I am raised to a kingdom which comprehends both the upper and the lower worlds, and entitles me to the homage of angels as well as of men. And yet, though I could so easily command the ministry of those more glorious creatures, it suits best with the scheme of my gospel to make use of you who shall accordingly be witnesses of all these things, by publishing the certain knowledge that you have of the important truths of my death and resurrection; and

VOL. II. H H

[1 Beginning at Jerusalem.] As for the grammatical construction of the Greek word α-είρησον, it would be foreign from the design of these notes to enter into it farther than to refer the learned reader to Elmer, [Obser. Vol. I. p. 288. and Hephe- lus (Annot. ex. Herod. p. 276, 277.) and to the original of Luke xxiii. 5. xxiv. 27. and Acts x. 37.—It was both gravely and wisely appointed by our Lord, that the gospel should begin to be preached at Jerusalem; gravely, as it encouraged the repentance of the greatest sinners, when they saw that even the murderers of Christ were not exempted from the offers of gospel mercy; and wisely, as hereby Christianity was more abundantly attested, the facts being published just on the spot where they happened; and as the vast concourse of people of various nations, present there at the Feast of Pentecost, would contribute greatly to its more speedy spread.

[2 You shall be witnesses of these things.] That this was the grand business of the apostles, is evident; and the ingenuous author of Miscellan-ae Sacra (Essay iii. p. 17—25.) has taken great pains to shew how the title of witnesses and the office of testifying is in the sacred writings appropriated to the apostles. But after all, though it was indeed essential to the apostolic office, that they who bore it should be able to testify the facts as of their own personal knowledge; yet it is certain, that a great many others, and who are therefore to look upon it as the great business of your lives to spread the notices and evidences of these facts. And, that you may be fully qualified for so high an office,

49 And behold, I am shortly to send upon you the great promise of my Father, relating to the miraculous effusion of the Holy Spirit upon you. (Compare Joel ii. 28. and Acts ii. 16, 17.) And as the Divine Wisdom sees fit to honour this place, sinful as it is, with the first view of this surprising appearance, I charge you not to go from hence before you have received those gifts and graces you shall be furnished with for the discharge of your ministry; but do you continue here in the city of Jerusalem till you are invested with this power from on high; whereby you will be enabled to bear your testimony in so advantageous and convincing a manner, that no falsehood or sophistry will be able finally to stand before you.

And further he said to them, When you shall thus be furnished with the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, go forth into all parts of the world, and preach the gospel to every human creature under heaven to whom Providence may lead you, whether Jew or Gentile: And take care that you deliver it with becoming seriousness; and let them see to it that they receive it with proportionable regard; for it is a matter of in-finitie importance. And accordingly I nowsolemnly declare, That he who sincerely believes your testimony, and, in token of that cordial faith, is baptized in my name, and continues to maintain a temper and conduct suitable to that engagement, shall certainly be saved with a complete and everlasting salvation; but he who believeth not this my gospel, when opened with such others, who were not apostles, were able to testify the same; and it was their duty, and no doubt their care to do it, as Providence gave them an opportunity; and the apostles had many other duties incum-ent upon them for the edification of the church, and in order to the performance of them were furnished with extraordinary gifts and powers, for which they would have had little occasion had it been their only business to testify these facts.

Continued in the city of Jerusalem till you are invested, &c.] This passage utterly overthrows Mr. Whiston’s assertion, that all this discourse was delivered on the night Christ rose from the dead: and that the ascension related by Luke in the conclusion of this chapter, is not that at the end of forty days, when he quitted this earth, to return to it no more, but a previous ascension which was made on the resurrection-day. For nothing can be more certain, than that the apostles did quit Jerusalem between Christ’s resurrection and the descent of the Spirit, and went into Galilee by Christ’s appointment, which was signified to them by the angel and by him-selves too.

such convincing evidence, and finally persists in willful impenitence and unbelief, as he rejects the most gracious counsel of God for his recovery, shall be condemned, by his righteous judgment, to future and everlasting punishment, and shall to his dreadful experience find that gospel which he has despised to be a savour of death to him.

Observe then the extent of your commission; and go forth therefore, not only into Judaea, but into all the rest of the world, and proselyte all 19 the nations of the earth to the faith and obedience of my gospel, baptizing them in the awful and venerable name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; that by this solemn sect. 111.

Mat. XVI. 16.

Mat. xxviii. 19.

Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.

1 When opened with such convincing evidence.] This is by no means a proper place to inquire into the proportion between the evidence which was peculiar to the days of the apostles, and that which is common to our own. But I hope it will be considered, on the one hand, how improbable it is that a Divine revelation, introduced as the gospel was, should ever be left so destitute of proofs in after-ages, that an honest man, after impartial consideration, might reject it; and on the other, how fit it was, that the danger of neglecting it should be strongly declared, lest it should seem itself to have left men at liberty to trifle with it.

2 Shall be condemned, &c.] As for the objection which has been urged against the truth of Christianity, from the denominary sentence which it here and elsewhere pronounces on those that reject it, I have considered it at large, since the former publication of this volume, and attempted to shew that it is so far from being conclusive that it would rather have been a greater difficulty in the scheme of Christianity if it had contained no such sentence. See my second letter to the Author of Christianity not founded on Argument. And I must earnestly entreat any reader, who fancies there is any force in what the deists urge on this head, attentively to consider what is there offered, before he presume on the contrary sentiment, which may perhaps be an error as fatal as it is absurd.

3 Proselyte all the nations of the earth.] The whole tenor of the succeeding books of the New Testament shows that Christ designed by this commission that the gospel should be preached to all mankind without exception, not only to the Jews, but to all the idolatrous Gentiles; but the prejudices of the apostles led them at first to mistake the sense, and to imagine that it referred only to their going' to preach the gospel to the Jews among all nations, or to those who should be willing to become Jews.—I render the word μπατιςων, proselyte, that it may be duly distinguished from ματισων, teaching (in the next verse), with which our version confounds it. The former seems to import instruction in the essentials of religion, which it was necessary adult persons should know and submit to, before they could regularly be admitted to baptism; the latter may relate to those more particular admonitions in regard to Christian faith and practice, which were to be built upon that foundation. It is certain, that no argument can be drawn from hence to the prejudice of infant-baptism; for had Christ sent out these missionaries to propagate Judaism in the world, he might have used the same language; "Go, and proselyte all nations, circumcising them in the name of the God of Israel, and teaching them to observe all that Moses commanded." 5

4 Baptizing them in the name of the Father, &c.] Though I dare not assert that the use of these very words is essential to Christian baptism, yet surely the expression must intimate the necessity of some distinct regard to each of the sacred three, which is always to be maintained in the administration of this ordinance; and consequently it must imply, that more was said to those of whose baptism we read in the Acts, than is there recorded, before they were admitted to it. The Christian Church in succeeding ages has acted a wise and safe part in retaining these words; and they contain so strong an intimation, that each of these persons is properly God, and that worship is to be paid, and glory ascribed to each, that I cannot but hope they will be a means of maintaining the belief of the one, and the practice of the other,
And promises to be with them to the end of the world.

Though the word Amen, with which each of been intended as an intimation of the con-

So that in consequence of this extraordinary confirmation, my gospel shall meet with a very general reception, and my heavenly Father, according to his promise, "shall give me the heathen for mine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for my possession." (See Psal. ii. 8.)

Such was the purport of our Lord's discourse, and in this manner he conversed with his disciples till his ascension, with the account of which illustrious fact we shall conclude this important history of his life.

IMPROVEMENT.

With how ill a grace could the Jews complain of any deficiency in the evidence of our Lord's resurrection, when he appeared alive to so great a number as five hundred at once! How glad must these disciples be when they saw the Lord! and what pleasure must they hear him speaking of those things which concerned the kingdom of God!

9 They shall take up serpents.] Jamblicus ( Vit. Pythag. cap. 23) says that Pythagoras could do this; and very credible writers have asserted, that in the eastern nations there is an art of charming snakes and serpents by the force of music, so as for a while to suspend their disposition to hurt. (See Bochart. Hierozoic, part 2. lib. iii. cap. 6. and compare Psalm lviii. 4, 5. and Eccles. x. 11.)—But this power was undoubtedly exerted without any such artifice and included (as in the case of Paul, Acts xxviii. 3—5.) an ability to heal the most dangerous wounds given by the bite of the most noxious animals.

If by some secret or open attempt made to destroy them, they drink, &c.] I add this clause, that none may imagine God ever intended that these miraculous powers should be used merely for ostentation, or to gratify the curiosity of spectators. Considering to what degrees of cursed refinement the art of poisoning was by this time brought, as well as how frequently execution was done, by giving poison to condemned persons in the age and country in which the apostles lived, such a promise as this will appear more important than the reader might at first apprehend.
We have surely perpetual reason for thankfulness, when we think of that commission which Christ gave to his disciples: nor is it a circumstance of little importance, that they had it in charge, when they published this message of grace, to begin at Jerusalem; though the religious opportunities that were abused by that ungrateful city had already been so great, and their provocations so many. Amazing condescension of the Prince of Peace, that he sent his ambassadors of peace to them when they had hardly laid aside the weapons with which they had slain him, and were scarce rested after the cruel fatigue which their officious malice had given them in abetting his murder! Behold, he offers them all the invaluable blessings purchased by his blood, while it was yet, as we may say, warm upon mount Calvary! and on the same principles, even unto this day, where sin hath abounded, there is grace abounding much more. (Rom. v. 20.)

The commission he gave his apostles, though it began at Jerusalem, did not end there; nor was it confined within the narrow limits of Judea; but they were appointed to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. To this day, in our remote land, enjoy the benefit of it. Let us remember the important consequences that will one way or another attend the gospel thus brought us. If we believe it, we shall be saved; but if we believe it not, we shall be damned. Life, or death, O my soul, is the certain issue of it, with regard to thee in particular. Be surety to thy servant, O Lord for good (Psal. cxix. 122.) and let my life be precious in thy sight!

Christ opened the understanding of the apostles, to apprehend the sense of scripture. Let us study that sacred book with an humble dependence upon the aid of that blessed Spirit by whom it was dictated. And let these apostles who were thus divinely taught, be reverently regarded as our surest guides, when we are studying the oracles of the Old Testament; considering the extraordinary commission with which Christ sent them forth, the power from on high with which he invested them, and the ample credentials which he thereby gave them.

These miraculous donations are now ceased, but that valuable promise still continues in force, That he will be with his ministers always, even unto the end of the world. In the strength of that gracious assurance, O thou faithful and true Witness, would thine humble ambassadors still go forth to all the labours and difficulties before them: remember thy word unto thy servants (Psal. cxix. 49.) and may it be unto us according to it! Amen!
Christ, after his last discourse with his disciples, ascends to heaven in their sight, from the mount of Olives in the neighbourhood of Bethany; and they joyfully return to Jerusalem, waiting for the Spirit. Acts I. 4.

SUCH was the conversation Jesus had with his disciples at Jerusalem, and such the commission he gave them: and now at length, having gathered them together on the fortieth day after his resurrection, he charged them again, as he had done before (Luke xxiv. 49, p. 484), not to depart from Jerusalem, to employ themselves in any secular cares at home; but rather to spend some succeeding days in extraordinary devotion in the temple, or in their secret retirements; that they might, with the most becoming temper, wait for the accomplishment of that promise of the Father, which [said he] you have again and again heard from me, both before and since my resurrection. (Compare John xiv. 26. xv. 26. xvi. 7. and Luke xxiv. 49.) For John indeed baptized with water, when he was sent to call men to repentance; but you well know, that he declared at the same time, "there was one coming after him, who should baptize in a more glorious manner with the Holy Spirit:" (see Mat. iii. 11. Vol. I. p. 103, And in accomplishment of this prediction, as you now are to be sent forth to preach the gospel, and to bear witness of me as the true Messiah, that whosoever shall believe in me may obtain remission of sins, you shall be plentifully furnished from above with all those graces that may enable you to fulfil your ministry, and by my means shall be baptized with an extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit; and this shall be done not many days hence.

And he then took them with him out of the city, and passed over the brook Kedron again, in a very different manner from that in which he had lately crossed it (John xviii. 1, p. 342), he led them out to the mount of Olives, and brought them through that ridge of hills, as far as to the boundaries of Bethany.

*As far as to the boundaries of Bethany.] This at least must be the import of the word not; but what is said elsewhere will not allow us to extend it to the town itself: for They discourse with Jesus on the mount of Olives.

When therefore they were come together with such peculiar solemnity; and Jesus had thus assembled them in a body (as they apprehended, on some extraordinary occasion) they asked him, saying; Lord, wilt thou at this time, when they have just been guilty of such aggravated wickedness, restore the kingdom to Israel? And wilt thou now in such a manner shew thy favour to a nation which so well deserves to be destroyed, that Israel shall at this time be raised from its servitude, to that extensive empire which ancient prophecies have led us to expect under the government of the Messiah?

7 But, as Jesus was not willing to enter on a subject, concerning which the Spirit would soon rectify their notions, he chose to check their curiosity, and said to them, whatever the schemes of providence may be, it is not for you to know, and therefore is not proper for you to inquire, what are those times or seasons which the Father has placed under his own authority; the Messiah’s kingdom shall indeed be triumphant, and the Israel of God shall reign with him; but where, or when, or how it shall be, it is not your present business to inquire: And therefore now let not these secret things engage and take up your attention; but let me rather exhort you to mind your present duty, and to leave the event of things to God: and, to prepare you for the important service you are called to, you shall indeed, as I have before told you, receive the power of the Holy Spirit coming upon you; and by this means you shall be qualified to be my witnesses, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and even to the ends of the earth; and you shall gather in subjects to my kingdom in the remotest regions, and subdue multitudes to the obedience of faith.

Acts i. 6. When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?

7 And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.

8 But ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

for the town of Bethany was about fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem (John xi. 18.) whereas the place from which our Lord ascended, on mount Olivet, was but a sabbath-day’s journey, or about half that distance from Jerusalem (Acts i. 12.) So that to reconcile what Luke here tells us in his gospel with the account he gives of our Lord’s ascension in the Acts, we must conclude, that he conducted his disciples only to the boundaries of Bethany, which came much nearer to Jerusalem, and took in part of the mount of Olives. (See act. i. on Mat. xxii. 1, p. 154.)—It is indeed possible, that our Lord might make his last visit on earth to Lazarus and his pious sisters; but it is manifest he did not ascend from the town of Bethany, where many others must have seen him, but from the mount of Olives, where none beheld him but his own disciples; nor is there any intimation in the words of the evangelist, that he came from Bethany to the mount of Olives on the day of his ascension, but rather that he went directly from Jerusalem thither.
Luke xxiv. 50.—And he lift up his hands, and blessed them.

51 And it came to pass [after the Lord had spoken [Acts, these things] unto them,] while he blessed them, he was parted from them, [Mark xvi. 19. Acts i. 9.]

Acts i. 9. And while they beheld, he was taken up, [Luke, and carried up into heaven,] and a cloud received him out of their sight, [and he sat on the right-hand of God.] [Mark xvi. 19. Luke xxiv. 51.]

11 Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same

6 While they beheld, he was taken up, &c.] It will I hope, be remembered, that it was for majesty, and not of necessity, that our Lord used the ministration of angels in carrying himself to heaven.—Dr. Jennings has observed, with his usual sagacity and propriety (Serm. at Berry-street, Vol. i. p. 373), that it was much more proper our Lord should ascend to heaven in the sight of his apostles, than that he should rise from the dead in their sight: for his resurrection was proved, when they saw him alive after his passion; but they could not see him in heaven, while they continued upon earth.

And then, lifting up his hands in a most solemn and devout manner, he blessed them, as one that had authority, not only to desire, but to command a blessing on them; and recommended them to the guardianship and care of his heavenly Father, to whom, after so long an abode on earth, he was now returning.

And it came to pass, after the Lord had spoken these things unto them, and had with great affection and solemnity discoursed with his disciples of the work they were to do, and of the power they should have to qualify them for it, even while he was blessing them, he was miraculously separated from them. And while they stedfastly beheld him, and fixed their eyes upon him with the strictest observation, he was taken up from the ground on which he stood, and gradually carried up into heaven, as it seemed by the ministry of attending angels (though he could certainly have ascended merely by his own power); and while he hovered in the air, at some distance from them, a bright cloud appeared, as a kind of triumphant chariot which God had prepared on this great occasion, and received him out of their sight: and, passing through crowds of adoring angels, he ascended to a throne highly exalted above all theirs, and sat down, even at the right-hand of God, on a seat of the highest dignity and authority, there to reign in the glories of his mediatorial kingdom, till all things shall be put under his feet. (See 1 Cor. xv. 25, 27.)

And as they were stedfastly looking up to heaven, while he went on in his amazing and triumphant progress, behold, two angels, in the form of men, in white and shining raiment, being of the number of those whose ministration God was pleased to make use of in this illustrious event, came and stood near them; Who also spake to them, and said, Ye men of Galilee, why do ye stand gazing up into heaven with such great astonishment? Is it not what your Lord himself has often told you, that he was soon to return
Luke xxi. 52.
And his disciples were so fully satisfied of his Divine power and glory, that they worshipped him with the humblest reverence, though he was now become invisible to them; and then (as he had ordered them) returned to Jerusalem with great joy, from the mount called Olivet, where he was parted from them; which is but a sabbath-day's journey, or about a mile distant from Jerusalem: and it exceedingly rejoiced their hearts to think that Jesus their Lord was in this singular manner honoured by his heavenly Father, and received up into a state of everlasting felicity and glory, in which he would be able to protect all his followers and to provide in the most effectual manner for their present and eternal happiness. And they were always in the temple, that is, they constantly attended there at proper times, and were daily present at the hours of prayer, praising and blessing God, both in his

John XXI. 23.—And there are also many other things which Jesus did; [and many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book:] the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. [John xx. 30.]

e. The world itself would not be able to receive the books, &c.] There would be no great inconvenience in allowing an hyperbole here, as most expositors do, of which we meet with other instances in scripture; (see Gen. xi. 4; Num. xiii. 33; and compare John xii. 19.) But I think the sense given in the paraphrase easier and his house, and in their own retirements. Amen! May God always be praised by us, and by all who receive his gospel, for the discoveries and attestations of it given to these his servants, and by them to us!

And, in a few days after this (as will be shewn more largely in the following history), their ascended Lord, in remembrance of his promise to them, sent down as a royal donative the extraordinary influences of his Spirit upon them, fully to qualify them for that important office to which they were designed. And going forth with this furniture, they preached the gospel every where throughout the whole Roman empire, and even among the barbarous nations, with amazing success: the Lord, according to his promise, working with them, and confirming the word of his grace by the signs and miracles which followed it; which were at once the most solid, as well as the most obvious and popular demonstrations of those Divine truths which they delivered. Amen! So may the presence of the Lord be always with his faithful ministers! and may his gospel be attended every where with efficacy and success, as well as with convincing evidences of its Divine authority!

And thus we have given a summary account of the most remarkable passages of the life of Christ during the time of his abode on earth: but after all, it must be considered only as a specimen, rather than a full narration; for there are also many other things that Jesus said and did, and indeed many other signs and miracles, that Jesus wrought, both before and after his resurrection, in the presence of his disciples which are not written in this book of the four evangelists, which is here completed; and which indeed are so numerous, that if every one [of them] should be recorded in all its circumstances, I am persuaded the work would amount to so vast a bulk, that the world itself would not be able to receive the books that should be written; but the very size of the volumes would necessarily prevent the generality of mankind from procuring or reading them." But these most necessary and impo these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, and that believing, ye might have life through his name. [Amen.] [John xxi.—25.]

IMPROVEMENT.

Thus did our victorious Saviour ascend on high, and lead captivity captive: the chariots of God which attended him were twenty thousand, even thousands of angels! (Psal. lxviii. 17, 18): and being gone into heaven, he is there seated on the right-hand of God; angels, and authorities, and powers being made subject to him; (1 Pet. iii. 22.) Let us his humble followers look after him, with holy joy and pleasing expectation; congratulating his triumphs, and trusting through his grace to share them.

Luke xxiv. 52.

Like the apostles, let us bow down and worship him: and while we continue here below, let us make it our daily labour and care to seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right-hand of God: (Col. iii. 1.) And, instead of amusing ourselves with the vain dreams of temporal grandeur and felicity, or with curious inquiries after those times and seasons which the Father has reserved in his own power, let us apply with vigour and zeal to that business which he has assigned us; labouring to the utmost to promote his gospel, and, by a diligent improvement of the heavenly world, to learn from our blessed Lord himself, or from those who conversed with him on earth, a multitude of such particulars of his life, as will be well worthy our everlasting admiration. In the mean time, the pious and attentive study of what is here recorded, may most happily prepare us for such discoveries, and add an unutterable relish to them: Amen! So may it be, to the Author of this Exposition, and to all those who do or may peruse it!

of our time and opportunities, to prepare for his final appearance, when the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with more public splendour than he returned thither, and shall come in the glory of Ver.

his Father, and his own glory, with a majestic pomp which every eye shall see, and with the sound of a trumpet, which even all the nations of the dead shall hear.

In the mean time, let us thankfully own his gracious presence with his disciples, whom he left behind him; and with admiring gratitude reflect upon the happy consequences of that presence, in the establishment of the gospel in the world, and the transmission of it even unto us, in so remote an age and country.

Let us especially praise him for these sacred records which contain such an authentic and exact account of those important facts in which we are all so nearly concerned; records incomparably more valuable than the writings of our private estates, or the charters of our public liberties. Let us earnestly pray that their great design may be answered in us; and make it our importunate request to Him who is the giver of all grace, that through the operations of that Holy Spirit, without the influence of which even scripture itself, with all our advantages for understanding and improving it, will be but a sealed book, or a dead letter, our faith may be nourished and confirmed by every portion of it which we read; and that our hearts may be so delivered into the mould of his word, that believing on Christ, under all the characters he bears, we may have life through his name; and may at length receive the end of our faith, in the complete salvation of our souls, through him, to whom with the Father, and the eternal Spirit, be undivided honours, and everlasting praises. Amen, and Amen!
St. Luke connects this history with his gospel, by a more particular account of the ascension of Christ than he had there given. Acts I. 1—12.

ACTS I. 1

THE former treatise, which I lately composed, and inscribed to thee, O Theophilus, contained a faithful narrative, as far as might be necessary for the confirmation of a Christian convert, concerning all the most considerable things which Jesus began both to do and to teach, and gave an account of the manner in which a The former treatise I composed.] This former treatise is undoubtedly the Gospel, which was written by St. Luke, and dedicated by him to Theophilus: and, as this history of the Acts was written by the same person, it is allowed by all antiquity, the author of it was St. Luke, whom the apostle Paul styles the beloved physician, (Col. iv. 14) and speaks of as his fellow-labourer, (Philan. ver. 24,) who was with him at Rome, when he wrote his epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, and again afterwards when he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy; (2 Tim. iv. 11) and so continued an associate and companion to the apostle Paul, as it is evident, from his manner of expression, the person of the Acts had been, in several of his travels, and in his dangerous voyage when he went first to Rome. This book is generally thought to have been written about the year of our Lord 63, at which time the history ends, which it is reasonable to suppose would have proceeded further, if it had been written later: and probably, as Mr. L’Enfant and others have observed, it was made as it were a second Part of St. Luke’s Gospel, which in all copies has the author’s name prefixed, while this is left without a title in the oldest manuscripts; though in the Syriac Version it is expressly ascribed to Luke, whom the translator seems to call his master.—

Not to mention the supposed allusions to this book in Barnabas, Clements Romanus, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, it is certain that Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius, bear the most express testimonies to the genuineness of it, in a multitude of passages, which I need not here insert, as they are produced at large by Dr. Benson, in the first Part of the Appendix to his History of the Plantation of Christianity, Vol. II. p. 295–210; and, since the publication of that, by Mr. Riscoe, in his learned Discourses at Boyle’s Lectures, chap. xiv. xv. where he has shewn in a most convincing manner, how capable these ancient writers were of judging in this matter, and how universally it was owned by the Christians of the first ages as a sacred book. How incontrovertibly it demonstrates the truth of Christianity, is shewn at large in both these useful treatises, and every attentive reader must needs observe it for himself.

b Began both to do and to teach.] To begin to do a thing, as Heinsius and many other critics have observed, is a common Greek idiom for doing or undertaking a thing. Compare Mat. xii. 1; with Luke vi. 1; and Mark vi. 2; with Mat. xiii. 54. See also Gen. ii. 3; Septuag. Numb. xxv. 1; Judg.
3 Until the day in which he was taken up, after that he through the Holy Ghost had given commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen.

3 To whom also he shewed himself alive after his passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God:

4 And, being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, which Christ opened the gospel, and in which he confirmed it, from his first appearance on earth to the last period of his abode upon it; Even to the very day in which he was taken up into heaven again, after he had by the influence and assistance of the Holy Spirit, with which he himself was so abundantly anointed, given a proper charge to the apostles, whom he had chosen to be the prime ministers of his kingdom, and the great instruments of extending it in the world: To whom also, in order to fit them more completely for the discharge of their important office, he presented himself alive after his sufferings, with many most evident testimonials of the truth of his resurrection; while, though he declined appearing publicly among the Jews, he often shewed himself to his disciples, being seen by them at various times, for no less than forty days, and speaking to them of the things concerning the kingdom of God, which was then shortly to be erected by their means.

And, on the fortieth day after his resurrection, having assembled them together with peculiar solemnity, he charged them not to depart from Jerusalem directly, though he was now to agree very well with this interpretation. To render it, the orders they were to execute by the Holy Spirit, (as in the Translation of 1727,) is altogether arbitrary, and is substituting a quite different truth instead of what was written by Luke.—I have before inserted the remaining verses of this section in the two last sections, to complete the History of our Lord to the time of his ascension: (See note 4, sect. cci.) But notwithstanding this it will he easily excused, that I have not omitted them here in their proper place, that the whole History of the Acts might stand together, and the work be kept entire.

3 Having assembled them together.—Though some considerable ancient as well as modern critics, and particularly Chrysostom, and Theophylact, understand the word ως εξεστησαν as expressive of Christ's eating with his apostles during the forty days spoken of above: the Notes of Elscuer, (Obsery. Vol. I. p. 355,) and Raphelius, (ex. Xen. p. 146, et Herod. p. 320, & seq.) seem abundantly sufficient to justify the version here given.

3 Not to depart from Jerusalem.] This seems a plain intimation, that, after our Lord had met his disciples in Galilee, he appointed the apostles to meet him at Jerusalem,

Judg. xiii. 5; xx. 31; Luke iii. 3; xvi. 28; and Acts ii. 4. Yet in most of these places it refers to some of the first actions or events of the kind. Accordingly I apprehend, with Chrysostom, that the phrase here refers to the account which Luke had given of Christ's ministry, from the beginning and first rise of it, (as he speaks, Luke ii. 2, 3,) to the ascension with which he concludes his Gospel.

By the Holy Spirit. It is certainly much more agreeable to the order and construction of the words in the original, to connect and explain them as above, than to refer them, as the Syriac and Ethiopic Versions do, to his choosing the apostles by the Spirit, or with Elscuer, (Obsery. Vol. I. p. 355,) to his being taken up by it. It is no wonder, concerning how short a history we have of what passed between Christ's resurrection and ascension, that this should be the only place which speaks of his acting by the Spirit after he rose from the dead: nor can I, with a late learned and ingenious writer, think that a sufficient reason for adhering to the versions mentioned above. (See Benson's Plantation of Christianity, Vol. I. p. 14, 15.) His breathing on the apostles, and saying, Receive ye the Holy Spirit; (John xx. 22,) seems also to sect. i.

Acts i. 2.
to stay no longer with them, and they knew of no inmediate business which they had there; but ordered them to wait there for the accomplishment of that promise of the Father, to send the Spirit which [said he] you have so often: and so lately heard from me. See John xiv. 26; xv. 26. xvi. 7 and Luke xxiv. 49.) For John indeed baptized with water only; when he was sent to call men to repentance; but, as he then declared, (Mat. iii. 11,) there is a nobler baptism you may expect from me; and to prepare and furnish you for the great work to which I have commissioned you, of preaching repentance and remission of sins in my name, you shall be baptized with an abundant effusion of the Holy Spirit, far beyond what you have ever yet received: And this, I assure you, shall be done within these few days; which proved by the event to be but ten.

But now, as the appointed time was come for his returning to the Father, Jesus withdrew with his apostles from the city, and led them out, as was observed before, unto the mount of Olives, as far as to the boundaries of Bethany. (See Luke xxiv. 50,) They therefore being come together, full of expectation that he had brought them thither with a view to some remarkable transaction, asked him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time break the Roman yoke from our necks, and after all this confusion restore the kingdom to the ungrateful people of Israels, who have been thus shamefully abusing Jerusalem, or perhaps accompanied them thither, and spent his last days on earth there; doing this last honour to the place, where God had chosen to dwell; and where the most solemn ordinances of his worship were administered.

[Said he.] These words, though omitted in the original, are plainly implied. Rapheliius (ex. Xen. p. 146; 147.) has produced many examples of such a change in the person speaking in the best Greek writers. Many others occur in the sacred authors. Compare Luke v. 14. Acts xvii. 3. xxiii. 22. Gen. xxvi. 7. Deut. i. 13. See also Psal. ii. 3. 6. and xci. 14. And I the rather mention it, as it may account for many prophecies of Christ in the Old Testament, where he is introduced as speaking on a sudden, in an abrupt manner; which is not so usual, especially in modern and western Writers.

For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, not many days hence.

When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?

Restore the kingdom to Israel.] They seem to have expected, that, when the Spirit was in so extraordinary a manner poured out, and the world, according to Christ's prediction, (John xvi. 8,) convinced of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, the whole nation of the Jews would own him for the Messiah, and so not only shake off its subjection to the Romans, but itself rise to very extensive and perhaps universal dominion. The word ἀνακάτασθι, intimates the shattered and weakened state, in which Israel now was. And I cannot but think, our Lord's answer may intimate, it should at length be restored, though not immediately, or with all the circumstances they imagined; which concession seems the most satisfactory answer to Rabbi Isaac's objection against Christianity, from his mistaken sense of these words. Chiswick Lexicon, Part II. p. 59.
abusing and crucifying thee? Is the empire of the Messiah immediately to be erected? and wilt thou begin it from Jerusalem; a place that, of all upon the face of the earth, seems to be the least worthy of such a distinguished honour?

But he, waving a direct answer to this curious question, and leaving it to the Spirit, which was shortly to be given, to rectify the mistaken notions on which they proceeded in it, only said to them, Cease your inquiries at present on this head: since it is not convenient for you now to know those times or seasons in which many remark able prophecies concerning my kingdom shall be fulfilled: For the Father has reserved them in his own power, under his own direction and disposal, and hath not expressly determined them in those predictions which certify the events themselves. And he hath taken this precaution, on purpose that the minds of his people might be kept in an humble, dependent, resigned frame: It will therefore be your wisdom always to cultivate such a temper, applying yourselves diligently to the duties of your office, and leaving all events to be determined by his infinite wisdom and goodness. But for the present let it suffice you to be told, that ere long, though I say not exactly when, you shall receive an extraordinary power of the Holy Spirit coming upon you; and in consequence of that, shall be abundantly qualified to be my witnesses both in the city of Jerusalem, and in all the land of Judaea; and not only so, but in Samaria too, though you have never yet addressed yourselves to the Samaritans in any former mission, (see Mat. x. 5. and compare Acts viii. 5, 14, 25.) and even to the remotest parts of the earth; the barbarous nations of which you shall visit, with a success which shall gloriously illustrate my Father's promise, of "giving me the heathen for mine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for my possession." (See Psalm ii. 8.)

And having said these things, he lifted up his hands and blessed them; (Luke xxiv. 50.) and while they beheld him with great earnestness, and high expectation of some extraordinary event consequent on this solemn preparation, he was lifted up from the ground in a miraculous manner, and rose gradually higher and higher, till at length a bright cloud, conducted by the ministry
ministry of angels, who joyfully attended their returning Lord, received him out of their sight, and they saw him no more.

This marvellous event was so astonishing to the apostles, that they continued with their eyes fixed the way that he was gone: And while they were stedfastly looking up to heaven, after him, as he went on in his triumphant ascent, behold two angels, in the form of men, in white and shining raiment, came and stood near them;

11 Who also spake to them, and said, Ye men of Galilee, why do ye stand thus gazing up to heaven, with so much surprize and amazement? This Jesus, who is now taken up from you into heaven, is gone to that world from whence he came, and in which he is to make his final abode: Nevertheless there will be a time, when he shall visit your earth once more, and so come in a visible form, riding on a cloud as his triumphant chariot, and attended by angelic guards, in the same manner as you have now beheld him going into heaven: Depart therefore in peace, and pursue the interest of his kingdom, with a firm assurance that his cause shall prosper amidst all opposition, and that while you are engaged in the service of this ascended triumphant Lord, you can never be losers by your fidelity and your zeal.

12 Then were the hearts of the apostles filled with joy by what they had seen and heard; and having worshipped their ascended Lord, (Luke xxiv. 52) they returned to Jerusalem, from the mount called Olivet, which is but a sabbath-day's journey, or about a mile distant from Jerusalem. And there they employed themselves in a daily course of public and private devotion; rejoicing in what they had seen, and firmly believing some extraordinary event was at hand, whereby they should be more fully qualified for the great work assigned them; which, whatever the hazard of it might be, they were firmly determined to undertake and prosecute.

10 And while they looked stedfastly towards heaven, as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel;

11 Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come, in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

12 Then returned they unto Jerusalem, from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath-day's journey.

1 A sabbath-day's journey from Jerusalem.] For the extent of a sabbath-day's journey, see Luke xxiv. 59. note e. The easiest manner of reconciling this text with Luke xxiv. 50. and John xi. 18. may be seen in the note on the former of those passages, sect. xcii. note a. And it is with pleasure that I see it confirmed and illustrated by the learned Mr. Biscoe, in his Sermons at Boyle's Lecture, p. 381—384. An elaborate and valuable work; by referring to which I shall have an opportunity of saving myself and the reader a great deal of trouble in these notes; for which therefore I gladly take this opportunity of making my acknowledgment to the worthy author,
IMPROVEMENT.

If we have ever seriously considered the contents of this excellent history on which we are now entering, we must surely see abundant reason to adore that gracious Providence which hath transmitted it to us, to confirm our faith, and animate our hope in the gospel. The account of our Lord’s ascension, with which it begins, relates to a fact of so great importance, that we may well bear the repetition of what we have read concerning it in the former history.

We see the apostles still dreaming of a temporal kingdom to be restored to Israel: So hard is it for the best of men to be entirely crucified to the world, even by the cross of Christ! (Gal. vi. 24.) Our Lord does not set himself at large, to combat that error; nor is it necessary that we should be eagerly solicitous on the like occasions, where mistakes do not affect men’s characters, or their eternal state. Prudently does he direct them to wave the indulgence of their curiosity. Let us learn to moderate ours, and refer times and seasons to him who hath reserved them in his own power. Let a sense of the perfect wisdom and goodness of the Divine Being silence and compose us, amidst all the darkness which veils our prospects of futurity.

With the apostles let us look up after an ascending Saviour, and send our wishes and our souls to heaven; where he now is, and where he must remain, till that important day in which he shall descend to the final judgment. Behold, he then cometh in the clouds, and every eye shall see him! (Rev. i. 7.) May we view him to our joy, and not to our terror! and lift up our heads with a serenity and cheerfulness, becoming those who see the approach of their complete redemption! (Luke xxi. 28.) In the mean time, may his cause and service be ever dear to us; and while he is attending to our concerns in the world above, may we with grateful and joyful alacrity, pursue that which he graciously condescends to own as his interest here upon earth.

SECT. II.

The apostles being returned to Jerusalem, and assembled with the rest of the disciples, Matthias is chosen to succeed Judas in the apostolic office. Acts I. 13. to the end.

A ND when they were come in, they went NOW the apostles being returned from the mount of Olives to Jerusalem, immediately after the ascension of Christ, as was observed.
The apostles and other disciples meet in an upper chamber.

sect. ii.

served in the conclusion of the former section; when they were entered [into the city] they presently retired for devotion, and went up into an upper room, where they usually held their assemblies. And as this was the place where the apostles commonly abode, all the eleven were there, both Peter, and James, and John and Andrew, Philip and Thomas, Bartholomew and Matthew, James, [the son] of Alpheus, and Simon the Zealot, and Judas, or Jude, [the brother] of James. But Judas the traitor was now dead, as was observed towards the close of the preceding history: (sect. cxviii.) and the vacancy occasioned by his death gave rise to that important business to which they quickly proceeded.

14 These all unanimously persevered in prayer and supplication, with great intensity and ardour of soul, together with the pious women, who were formerly mentioned as attending the cross of their Lord, and particularly Mary, so celebrated as the mother of Jesus: and also with his brethren and near kinsmen after the flesh, of whom there were some other besides the apostles whose prejudices, though once strong, were now happily worn off. (Compare John vii. 5.)

15 And in these days, while they were waiting for the promise of the spirit, Peter rising up in the midst of a full assembly of the disciples, spake as follows: Now the number of persons that were met together in that place, was about an hundred and twenty; the greater part of the five hundred to whom Christ had appeared, (1 Cor. xv. 6.) continuing in Galilee, during this interval between the feast of the passover and that of pentecost. And he said,

O ye men that hear me this day, [and] whom I regard as my brethren, in the bonds of religion, acted xx. 8.) See Bois. Exercit. p. 64, & seq.

The brother of James.] The expression in the original is ambiguous, and may signify either son or brother: But Jude himself expressly determines it, that he was his brother, in ver. 1. of his epistle.

Number of persons. It is literally the number of names; but it is well known that conjunct often signifies persons; (See Rev. iii. 4. xi. 15. and Raphel, ex Polyb. p. 297.) And it best suits the English language, to render it so.
17 For he was numbered with us, and had obtained part of this ministry.

18 Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity; and

d This scripture should be fulfilled, &c.] Two prophecies are afterwards quoted for this purpose, (ver. 20.) from Psal. lxix. 25, and cix. 8, and it has been matter of much debate, whether they do in their original sense refer to Judas, or to the enemies of David. Mr. Jeffery (in his Review, p. 179, & seq.) maintains the former, and Dr. Sykes [on the truth of Christianity, p. 271, 272.] the latter. It is certain, the sixty-ninth psalm is not to be confined to Judas: for St. Paul (Rom. xi. 9, 10) has quoted the 22d and 23d verses of it, as applicable to the unbelieving Jews in general. There are so many passages in both the psalms in question, more applicable to David than to Christ, that I was very inclined to render the wards before us, The scripture which the Holy Ghost spake before by the mouth of David, must necessarily have been fulfilled concerning Judas, &c, and to have explained them as if the apostle had said, "That vengeance, which David foretold as to be executed on his enemies, must much more fall on Judas, whose perjuries and cruel attack on Christ himself rendered him so much more criminal." But it is certain, the order of the Greek words will not so naturally admit this; nor do I remember to have seen the phrase παρακεκλήσαι πατερα, the particle πατερα, or πατερα, with the article, being much more proper in that connection. (Comp. Mat. xiii. 14. and Luke xxi. 37.) I therefore conclude, that, while David prophesied of the calamities which should befall his persecutors, it was revealed to him by the Holy Spirit, that the enemies and murderers of the Messiah should inherit those curses in all their terror, and be yet more miserable than the persons on whom they were more immediately to fall. This fact (in itself exceeding probable) I take to be asserted in these words, as what was revealed by the same spirit to the apostle Peter. And I hope, the reader will excuse the length of a note, which may serve as a key to many other passages of the New Testament.

Purchased a field.] It is worth observing, that an action is sometimes said in Scripture to be done by a person, who was the occasion of doing it. (Compare Gen. xliii. 58. Exod. xxiv. 8. 1 Kings xiv. 16. Isa. vi. 10 Jer. xxxviii. 23. Rom. xiv. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 16. and 1 Tim. iv. 16.) But some would render τιμίως, he possessed the field, supposing Judas was buried there. (See Bren. and Heins. in loc.) Dr. Lightfoot.
He takes notice of the traitor's miserable end.

was the reward of his iniquity: For his conscience would not suffer him to keep it; but he threw it down, as you know, in the temple, and then going away, he hanged himself. (Mat. xxvii. 5.) But that which should have supported the weight of his body breaking, he could not fully execute his horrid design; and falling down on his face, he burst asunder in the middle, and all his bowels were in a miserable manner poured out upon the ground; so that he expired in the utmost agonies both of body and mind, to the horror of all that beheld him.

19 (And by the way, this was a fact so public and notorious, that it was known to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who could not but take notice of such an extraordinary circumstance; so that that field which was so purchased is to this day called in their language, which is the Syriac dialect Aceldama, that is, The field of blood, as being bought with money which was, in more senses than one, the price of blood; having been the cursed hire for which Judas sold the blood of his master, and in effect his own.)

Now, said Peter to the disciples, I observed to you, that the scripture speaks something of this remarkable event; for it is written in the book of Psalms, (Psal. lxxix. 25.) "Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man inhabit it;" and again, (Psal. ix. cix. 8.) "Let another take that is, another shall take and discharge his office." The former of these clauses is already awfully verified, as he is become such a spectacle foot thinks, he was strangled in the air by the Devil, and thrown down headlong in this field; and so might be said to possess it, and occasioned its being called the Field of blood. (Hor. Heb. on Mat. xxvii. 5, and in loc.)

"Falling down on his face, he burst asunder, &c." This Matthew's account is reconciled with Luke's above. (See note on Mat. xxvii. 5.) I find the learned Casaubon has taken the same method; nor can I see any reason to recede from this interpretation, on the most attentive review of the various solutions proposed by Mr. Biscoe; (Boyle's Lect. p. 637—654.) But, were I to change it, I should prefer to any other that of Limbothi: that some Jew, who would have concealed the suicide, cut Judas down, and threw him into some pit or valley, where he was afterwards found lying on his face, with his bowels gushed out.—That πτήσας should be rendered, not falling headlong, but falling down on his face, so proved by Raphelius, (ex Polyb. p. 103, & seq.) and Elsner, (Observ. Vol. I. p. 358, 359.)

19 And it was known unto all the dwellers at Jerusalem; insomuch as that field is called, in their proper tongue, Aceldama, that is to say, The field of blood.

20 For it is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein; and, His bishopric let another take.
And advises that another apostle should be chosen in his room.

21 Wherefore of these men which have companied with us, all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us,

22 Beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of his resurrection.

23 And they appointed two, Joseph called Barsabas, who was surnamed Justus and Matthias.

24 And they prayed, and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, shew whether of these two thou hast chosen, table of horror, that men will detest the very place where he lived; and the other must be now accomplished. It is necessary therefore, that of the men who have conversed intimately with us, and have attended during all the time in which the Lord Jesus was going in and coming out among us, and so can testify of all he did and said, Beginning from the baptism of John, when he first entered on his ministry, even to the day in which he was taken up from us into heaven, one of these should be chosen to the apostolic office, to be made a witness with us of that great and fundamental fact, his resurrection from the dead, upon which the proof of his being the Messiah so evidently rests.

The apostle had no sooner spoke, but immediately the whole assembly assented to the reasonableness of this proposal; and accordingly they set up two men; the one called Joseph Barsabas, who was also surnamed Justus, on account of the remarkable openness and integrity of his temper; and the other, a person of no less eminent note for his piety, who was called Matthias.

And they prayed with great solemnity, answerable to the importance of the occasion, saying, Thou, Lord, who knowest the hearts of all, and perfectly discernest every secret sentiment of the soul, and all the future circumstances of life! we humbly intreat thee to shew, which of these two, whom we esteem thy faithful servants, thou hast chosen to be advanced to this distinguished honour; That he may take part of this ministry, and share with thine other servants in the apostleship, from which Judas is fallen by [this] transgression to his eternal ruin; that he might go to his own place, to that miserable world, which

\[1\] One of these should be made a witness with us. They might reasonably and modestly conclude, that it was fit the number of apostles, which Christ first chose should be kept up, perhaps in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel. But it is impossible, as well as quite unnecessary, that we should at this distance of time be able to assign a reason, why the two that are afterwards mentioned, and no more, were proposed as candidates. Perhaps a longer and more intimate acquaintance with our Lord might entitle them to a preference on this occasion.

\[2\] Joseph called Barsabas. The Cambridge Manuscript reads Barnabas; but Dr. Benson seems to have assigned solid reasons for concluding, this was not Barnabas the Cyprian, (Acts iv. 36.) of whom we read so often in this history, whose name was also Joseph, or Josephus, (which are both the same) but rather the Joseph, mentioned Mat. xxvii. 56. and Mark vi. 3, the son of Cleopas or Alpheus, and brother to at least two of the apostles, James the Less, and Jude.
which in thy righteous judgment is appointed for the reception of such heinous offenders, and the due punishment of such enormous crimes.

26 And after this prayer they gave out their lots for each; and the lot fell upon Matthias, on which they concluded, that he was the person whom God had appointed: And the rest of the apostles accordingly gave him the right hand of fellowship, so that for the future he was numbered with the eleven apostles", and made the twelfth of that venerable society of men.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. It was wisely and well determined by the apostles, to spend this interval of time in devotion and in Christian converse; for never have we more reason to expect the communication of the Holy Spirit of God to us, than when we are sharing our time between the one and the other, so far as Providence affords us leisure from our secular affairs. With their devotions they properly joined a care for the future edification of the church, and therefore chose another apostle, to complete the number which our Lord had appointed.

25 It is dreadful to think how the vacancy happened, and by what a horrible transgression it was, that one of the sacred society fell from his office. The band of God's righteous vengeance was heavy upon him, and brought him in a few hours to public infamy and irrecoverable destruction. So that his example, dreadful as it is, shews us at once that no dignity of office can secure men from sin, and that when they break through the solemn bonds of a remarkably high and eminent profession, they must expect a punishment proportionably signal.

Riches

That that respect signifies a place proper and suitable for such a wretch, and therefore by God's righteous judgment appointed for him many writers have shewn, and particularly Dr. Benson, in his History of the first Plantation of Christianity, p. 23. (Compare Mat. xxvi. 24. John vi. 70, 71, and xvii. 12.)

1 They gave out their lots.] This was, no doubt, most impartially adjusted, though we know not in what particular method. The honour God has conferred on inquiries by lot, (Josh. vii. 14, 15. 1 Sam. x. 20, 21.) and the custom of fixing the officers of the priests in the temple, while in waiting there, by lot, (1 Chron. xxiv. 5, 7, and Luke i. 9.) might lead them to this turn of thought. Grotius has shewn in his note here, that such a designation to sacred offices prevailed also among some pagannations.

26 And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias, and he was numbered with the eleven apostles.
Riches profit not in the day of wrath: (Prov. xi. 4.) The time is swiftly approaching, when ill-gotten gain will prove a burden and a terror, and the wages of righteousness will appear as the price of an Aceldama, a field of blood; even in that dreadful day 18 when impenitent sinners go to their own place; to those abodes of 25 misery, which are so properly prepared for them, and so justly assigned to them; assigned especially to those whose business (like that of Judas) it was, to preach repentance unto others, to show them their transgression, and to warn them of their danger and who were more especially obliged to have inforced their admonitions and their precepts, by the peculiar lustre of their own examples.

But the badness of the man, who in some instances may be advanced to bear the most sacred office, is not to be interpreted to the disgrace of that office itself. The apostles were careful to keep up the honour of theirs, by seeking out a more proper person, who might do his part towards taking away the reproach which Judas had brought upon it, and might approve himself a worthy wit-22 ness of the resurrection of Jesus, on the knowledge of which depended the salvation of millions. After all, they refer the matter to the determination of Providence, to which they make a very instructive appeal. Let us always remember the universal and intimate inspection of the Divine Being. Thou Lord, knowest 24 the hearts of all! All their treachery, and all their integrity, is manifest in thy sight: And, in persons of equal sincerity, thou discernest what renders one more fit than another, for this or that situation and service! Let it be our desire to follow Providence ourselves; and let us pray, that God will set over all his churches pastors after his own heart, who may feed them with knowledge and understanding. (Jer. iii. 15.)

The lot is cast into the lap; but, casual as the determination 26 may seem, the whole disposal thereof is from the Lord. (Prov. xvi. 33.) Let us own his hand in the determination of every circumstance which befalls us, and especially in those by which any solemn and important trust may be committed to us: And may the consideration of it be an additional engagement upon us, to discharge it with becoming diligence and entire fidelity!

SECT. III.

The descent of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost, with the former part of the speech which Peter made to the multitude on that great occasion. Acts II. 1—21.
and continued the same course of religious exercises as before, for several succeeding days. And when the day of Pentecost was completely arrived, that is, when the morning of the fiftieth day after the passover was come, it being then the first day of the week, the apostles with the rest of the hundred and twenty disciples were together; and they were all assembled with the most unanimous affection in the same place, in the upper room which was mentioned before, where they had used to meet. And on a sudden there was a very extraordinary and surprising sound from heaven as of a rushing violent wind, which shook the very place, and came with such a mighty force, that it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared to them at the same time a number of divided tongues, made as it were of fire; i.e. bright fully come, they were all with one accord in one place.

2. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting.

3. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as

5 The day of Pentecost.] It has often been observed, that, as our Lord was crucified at one of the great Jewish feasts, it was fit that he should be glorified at another. And this of Pentecost was chosen with peculiar propriety, as next succeeding that of the passover, at which Christ suffered: and also, as it was celebrated in commemoration of the giving of the law from mount Sinai on that day, (Exod. xix. 1, 11.) and as the first fruits were then offered and appointed, (Exod. xxiii. 16, and Lev. xxiii. 17.) To these answered the fuller discovery of the Gospel on this occasion, and the anointing the first fruits of the Christian church by the effusion of the Spirit as Brennus has well observed. (See also Miscell. Sacra. Essay I. p. 113—115.) The solemnity of the feast, the general expectation of the Messiah that prevailed among them, and the length of the days, as it was about the middle of summer, would, no doubt, bring great numbers to Jerusalem at that time, who, when they returned home, and reported this great event, would naturally make way for greater regard to the apostles, when they came to the places where these people dwelt.

b Was completely arrived.] The first day of unleavened bread, that is, the fiftieth of Nisan, began this year on Friday evening; and this was the day on which they were to offer the wave sheaf: and from the morrow after that day, that is, from the Saturday evening, they were to count seven weeks, or forty-nine days, which would bring the fiftieth, that is, the day of Pentecost, then to begin on Saturday evening; so that on the Lord's day morning, it might properly be said to be fully come. See Lev. xxiii. 15, 16. The word ἐγείρετο τοὺς cannot signify, that the day was ended but that it was fully come. Compare Luke i. 57. ii. 21. and see Beza in loc.

b Divided tongues as of fire.] This wonderful appearance in the form of fire, might be intended to signify the quickening and purifying influences of the Spirit, as well as to illustrate John the Baptist's prediction, that Christ should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. (Mat. iii. 11, and Luke iii. 16.) But I will not venture to affirm with Mr. Fleming, (Christol. Vol. I. p. 524.) and Elshnor, (Obser. Vol. I. p. 564.) that it was to signify, that the Shekinah (which appeared in a glorious flame, surrounded with a cloud,) was now passed from the Jews to the disciples of Jesus. The Jews (as Wolfius tells us,) have a tale among them, relating to the appearance of some flashes of fire, which fell on an assembly of their doctors, while they were studying the law; which probably was invented; to stir, or imitate this important history. Bus (Exercit. p. 67.) thinks, each tongue, appeared complete, and that they are said to be divided, on account of the distribution that was made of one to each person. But it seems, that the division of each might aptly represent the variety of languages, with which each person was endowed; and some have thought that the form of the mitres worn by bishops, (according to the Roman ritual,) bears some allusion to the supposed form of these cloven tongues. It is observed by Dr. Lightfoot and others, that as the division of tongues at Babyl once introduced confusion, and was the means of casting off the Gentiles from the knowledge of the true God; so now there was a remedy provided by the gift of tongues at Zion, to bring the Gentiles out of dark-as of fire, and it sat upon each of them.

And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.

And there were dwelling at Jerusalem, Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven.

Now as this happened at one of the three grand yearly feasts, and at that in which the days were longest, there were sojourning in Jerusalem at that time a great number of pious men, [that were] by their descent or by profession Jews: who were come thither out of all parts of the known world, from every nation under heaven, where any of that people dwelt, or any that were proselytes to the Jewish religion.

And when this strange report came to be noised abroad, as it presently did, the multitude soon

ners into light, and to destroy the veil which had been spread over all nations. (Isa. xxv. 7.)

Sec. Light. Hor. Heb. and Graf. in loc.

Upon each of them.] I agree with the learned Dr. Benson, (Plant. of Christianity, page 26, 27,) who thinks, (as Jerom and Chrysostom did,) that it is probable, each of the hundred and twenty shared in this miraculous donation. See also Miscell. Sacra. Essay I. p. 101, 102.)

The hundred and twenty, mentioned chap. i. 13, are plainly referred to, ver. 1, as the persons here assembled: And as this would best illustrate the pouring forth of the Spirit on the houfnnas, as well as on the servants of God, (ver. 18,) so it is certain, that the manuscripts, which would confine this effusion to the apostles, are of very small authority. Nor do Beza’s arguments on the other side of the question appear to me by any means conclusive. Compare Acts x. 44—46 and xi. 15—17.

From every nation under heaven.] Should this be taken for an hyperbole, we have other instances in Scripture of the like way of speaking; as where we read of cities walled up to heaven, (Deut. i. 28, ix. 1,) and of the dread of the Jews falling upon every nation under the whole heaven. (Deut. ii. 25.) See also Gen. xi. 4; Judg. xx. 16; and Psal. cvii. 26.—But not to insist upon it, that the Jews were then so numerous, as to have spread through every country, so that, as Agrippa in Josephus says, “There was not a people upon earth, who had not Jews inhabiting among them;” (Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 16. § 4, p. 191.)

Hecceiimp.) the expression here can signify no more, than that there were some at Jerusalem at that time from all the several nations among whom the Jews were dispersed. See Lightfoot, and Whitby, in loc.) It would be very absurd to argue from hence, that there must be natives of Britain and America at Jerusalem, when this great event happened. And many arguments, drawn from such universal phrases elsewhere, seem as weak as this would be.

When this report came abroad.] De Dieu concludes, this must signify thunder, which he too confidently says, is always the import of 5ις and παρει in the Hellenistic language, and argues from hence, that the rushing wind (ver. 2,) was attended with thunder. But the following clause, which refers gathering together, and were quite confounded and amazed: For every one of this various assembly heard one or another of them as they addressed themselves by turns to people of a different language, speaking to each of them in his own proper dialect. And they were all astonished at it beyond measure, and wondered at this marvelous event, saying one to another, Behold, how unaccountable is this! Are not all these that speak by birth and country Galileans? And how then do we every one of us hear them, as they direct their speech to so many different people, who are here come together out of so many nations, speaking to each of us his own native language?

For while there are among us Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and Persians, and those that inhabit Mesopotamia; and those that dwell too in Judea, where the dialect is so different from that of Galileae; and likewise the natives of Cappadocia and Pontus, and of the country more properly called the proconsular Asia; As well as the inhabitants of the neighbouring provinces of Phrygia and Pamphilia, of Egypt and the parts of Africa which are about Cyrene, and the many sojourners in this city [who are] Romans, some of us native Jews, and others of us proselytes to the Mosaic religion; Together with those of both these sorts who use the language of Crete, and those who are Arabians; we do every one of us hear them speaking in our own native tongues the wonderful works of God, in the surprising testimonies he has given to the mission of Jesus who was lately crucified, not only by the miracles he wrought, but by his resurrection, and were confounded, because that every man heard them speak in his own language.

And they were all amazed, and marvelling, saying one to another, Behold, are not all these which speak Galileans? And how hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?

Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia.

Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes.

Cretes, and Arabians, we do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God.

refers the assembly to the different languages spoken by those on whom the Holy Spirit fell, plainly shows, that it was not thunder which brought them together; which indeed could hardly occasion their assembly in one place.

Elamites, and those that inhabit Mesopotamia.] Bishop Cumberland takes these to be the remainder of the Jews, who had been carried captive into Assyria, first by Tiglath-pileser, (2 Kings xxv. 29) and afterwards by Shalmaneser, and placed in the cities of the Medes. (2 Kings xvii. 6.) See Camb. Orig. Gent. page 225.

Romans, Jews, and proselytes.] It appears from Josephus, Suetonius, Tacitus, the Roman writers, and other writers of this age, in a variety of passages well known to the learned, that great numbers of Jews dwelt at Rome about this time, and made many proselytes to their religion. See Mr. Biscoe, at Boyle's Lecture, p. 55.

We hear them speaking in our own tongues.] Cyprian, and Epiphanius, and some later critics have thought, (particularly from ver. 8.) that the miracle was not in the speakers but the hearers; so that, while the apostle spake his own native Syriac, it would appear Latin to one, and Greek to another, &c. But this must be a mistake; for we read of their speaking with tongues, ver. 4, before any foreigners came in upon them. (Compare chap. x. 46, and 1 Cor. xiv. 2.) Nor could what they said, on this supposition, have appeared a jargon to any; 'which yet we find to have been the case, ver. 13. See Castellio, on ver. 4.
They are derided by some, as if they were drunk.

surrection and ascension: And while they are discoursing of these marvellous events, they run through such a great variety of languages, which no one can suspect they have ever been taught, with so much readiness and propriety, as among the most learned of mankind is perfectly unequalled.

And they were all in a mixture of amazement and perplexity, and said one to another, What can this unaccountable appearance possibly mean?
Or what can it be designed to effect? But others of them, and particularly those who were native Jews, and understood none of these foreign languages, hearing the sound of their words as a kind of barbarous jargon, derided them, and in a mocking and contemptuous manner said, Surely these men have begun the festival betimes, and are undoubtedly filled with sweet intoxicating wine, and therefore make this uninttelligible noise.

But Peter standing up with the eleven, who were then in company with him, and who had each of them before been speaking in different languages, raised his voice so loud that those who had been reproaching them might hear it, and said to them, in the tongue that was commonly used among them, O ye men of Judea, and especially all you that inhabit Jerusalem, whom I would be solicitous in the first place to inform and convince, let this be known unto you as to the cause of this extraordinary appearance, and listen to my words with an attention becoming the importance of the occasion on which I speak.

For these men are not drunk, as you, who do not understand them, rashly suppose; and it is indeed very uncharitable for you to imagine it, conidering that it is now but the third hour of the day, that is, about nine o'clock in the morning, the hour of morning sacrifice; before which, you know, none, who have any regard for their character, will allow themselves so much as to taste wine, and much less to drink any

12 And they were all amazed, and were in doubt, saying one to another, What meaneth this?
13 Others mocking said, These men are full of new wine.

14 But Peter, standing up with the eleven, did up his voice, and said unto them, Ye men of Judea, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken unto my words:

15 For these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day.

Filled with sweet wine.] There was no new wine, or must, at the feast of Pentecost, as Ezra and many others observe; but γλυκον properly signifies sweet wine. We are informed by Plutarch, that the ancients had ways of preserving their wine sweet a great while; and such wines were known to be very intoxicating.

The third hour of the day.] Josephus tells us, that on feast-days the Jews seldom cat or drank till noon; (De vitiis sui, § 54, p. 96, Hazaret,) which if it were fact, would (as Gratias observes,) render this calumny the more incredible.—As to the computation of the Jewish hours, see sect.
61, note b, on Acts iii. 1.

Peter defends them, and shows it was foretold by Joel.

sect. iii.

Acts II. 16. *But this which has occasioned so much admiration, and which you know not how to account for, is that great event which was spoken of by the prophet Joel, *chap. ii. 28—32. where it is written, "And it shall come to pass in the last days, or in the times of the Messiah, saith the ever blessed God, I will pour out an extraordinary effusion of my Spirit upon all flesh, that is, upon some of all ranks and orders, of all ages and nations of men: And as the wonderful effect of it, your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see prophetic visions, and your old men shall dream significant and divinely inspired dreams. Yea in these days I will, in a most extraordinary manner, pour out the gifts of my Spirit upon my servants, and even upon my handmaids; and they shall also prophesy, and shall not only publish and proclaim the riches of my grace, but shall foretell the judgments that are coming upon those who shall continue hardened in their sins. And this effusion of my Spirit shall be followed with a most awful revolution; for I will give you to see prodigies in heaven above, and signs upon the earth beneath; And such destructive employed for their conviction, would fully justify God in the severest vengeance he should execute upon that hardened people.

*By the prophet Joel.] Some have explained this prophecy, as referring, in its original sense, to the pouring forth the Spirit on the Jews at their last general conversion; and think Peter's argument is, as if he had said, "You need not wonder at such an event as this, since so much more is at length to be expected." (See Jef fery's True Grounds, p. 190.) But from attending to the context I am led to conclude, for reasons too long to be here stated, that the prophecy is here applied in its most direct sense, and that the event of this great day, and the destruction of the Jews for rejecting a gospel so confirmed, were originally referred to it.

*b In the last days.] Every one knows, that the last days was a phrase commonly used to denote the times of the Messiah, when the gospel should be published, which is the last dispensation of divine grace: but here it see ms to have a more particular view to the days immediately preceding the destruction of the Jewish nation, or the last days of that people, when the extraordinary means which were in vain to exclude, their repentance, were at length employed for their conviction, would fully justify God in the severest vengeance he should execute upon that hardened people.

*Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy.] Compare Acts xxi. 9. If this miracle had not been foretold, the argument for the truth of Christianity from it would, no doubt, have been conclusive; but, as it was referred to in the Old Testament, it might dispose the minds of the Jews still more readily to regard it, as it was indeed the more remarkable.

7 Prodigies in heaven above, and signs upon the earth beneath.] This doubtless refers to the prodigies and signs which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem; (such as, the flaming sword hanging over the city, and the fiery comet pointing down upon it for a year; the light that shone upon the temple and the altar in the night, as if it had been noon-day; the opening of the great and heavy gate of the temple without hands; the voice heard from the most holy place, Let us depart from hence; the adornment of Jesus the son of Ananus, crying dreadful wars shall arise, as a punishment for the wickedness of those who reject the mercy I offer, that there shall be blood shed in abundance, and fire scattered abroad to consume your cities and villages, so that a cloud of smoke shall ascend from the ruins of them. Yea, there shall be such confusion and misery, and all regular government both in church and state shall be so entirely dissolved, that the sun shall as it were be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and illustrious day of the Lord shall fully come, in which he will take ample vengeance on every unbeliever. And it shall come to pass, that whoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved.

These premises the apostle Peter afterwards applied, to the conviction of those who had rejected and slain our Lord; and the argument wrought most powerfully upon them. But the prosecution and success of this address must be referred to the following sections.

IMPROVEMENT.

With how much attention and delight should we read the history of this glorious event, so frequently referred to in the predictions of our Lord, and of so great importance to the Christian cause; the miraculous descent of the Holy Spirit! He came down as a mighty rushing wind, to signify the powerful energy of his operations, whereby the whole world was to be shaken crying for seven years together, Woe, Woe, Woe! the vision of contending armies in the air, and of intrenchments thrown up against a city there represented; the terrible thunderings and lightnings, and the dreadful earthquakes, which every one considered as portending some approaching evil: (All which by the singular providence of God are recorded by Josephus, Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 5 [al. vii. 12] § 5; & lib. iv. cap. 4 [al. 7.] § 5, in that history of his, the truth of which the emperor Titus attested under his own hand: (See Joseph Vit. § 65, p. 53, Hasting.) And accordingly the greatest part of these circumstances are inserted in Tacitus, (Hist. lib. v. op. 15,) and happily preserved, though most of his account of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem be lost.

Whoever shall invoke the name of the Lord, &c. This context being quoted thus was a strong intimation, that nothing but their acceptance of the gospel could secure them from impending ruin. Brennus has proved by an ample collection of acts (in his note on this place,) that calling on the name of the Lord is often put for the whole of religion: And if it do not here directly signify invoking Christ, which is sometimes used to express the whole Christian character. (Compare Acts ix. 14, 21. xxii. 16. Rom. x. 12, 13. and 1 Cor. i. 2,) it must imply, that it is impossible for any who reject him to pray in an acceptable manner. How awful a reflection!
shaken. He fell upon them in tongues of fire, cloven or divided into several parts, to denote the most celebrated effect to be immediately produced, in causing them to speak with the utmost readiness and propriety, languages they had never learnt. An astonishing miracle! which was intended, not for pomp and ostentation, but to render them capable of propagating the gospel to the most distant nations, to which the grace of God had determined to send it.

It is observable, that this divine gift fell upon them while they were unanimously gathered together; perhaps to intimate, that the influences of the Spirit are most to be expected where there is the greatest unanimity, and the greatest devotion. Thus did the blessed Jesus accomplish what had been foretold concerning him. (Mat. iii. 11,) that he should baptize his disciples with the Holy Ghost, and with fire. And surely the sacred flame did not only illuminate their minds with celestial brightness, but did also cause their whole hearts to glow with love to God and zeal for his gospel. To this purpose may he still be imparted to us, whether we hold public or private stations in the church; and may our regards to him be ever most dutifully maintained: Especially may he be poured out upon the ministers of it, to direct them how they should speak the wonderful things of God; and may their hearers, under his gracious energy, gladly receive the word.

Let us not wonder if the more common operations of the Spirit on men’s minds be derided by profane ignorance and folly, when there were some, even on this glorious day, who were stupid or malicious enough to ascribe the amazing event we have been surveying, to the supposed intoxication of the apostles, and to say, they were full of sweet wine. But let us observe, how well Peter vindicated himself and his brethren, with words, not of satire and reproach, but of meekness and sobriety, as well as of truth: shewing at once the most perfect command, both of his reason and of his temper. Justly did he apply on this occasion that celebrated prophecy of Joel, in which this grand event is so exactly described. Let us adore the divine goodness, which has poured forth the Spirit like a refreshing dew upon his church. Let us pray that we may all receive it, in such degrees as may suit the present state of things. And let us deprecate those judgments, which the contempt of the Spirit has too evident a tendency to produce.

Justly might God have made our land gloomy and horrible with blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. Justly might he have turned our sun into darkness, and our moon into blood. Let us adore his patience that these national judgments, which are so well deserved, have been thus long with-held. But let us also remember, that the great and notable day is approaching, in which the Lord
God had approved and raised up Jesus whom they crucified. 515

Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not a gospel so gloriously attested. (2 Thess. i. 7, 8) Then shall these figurative expressions be literally fulfilled. Then shall the heavenly luminaries be quenched in their orbs; the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the earth and all that is therein shall be burnt up: (2 Pet. iii. 10) But even then, all those that have believed in Christ, and Ver.21 with obedient love have called upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved with an everlasting salvation. May that be through grace our happy portion; and may its prospects be daily brightening upon us, till it shall open in its full lustre, and shine beautiful and glorious amidst the flames of a dissolving world!

SECT. IV.

Peter continues his discourse to the people just after the descent of the Holy Spirit, and shews that Jesus, whom they crucified, was risen from the dead, and was the true Messiah. Acts II. 22—26.

Acts II. 22. YE men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you, by miracles and wonders, and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know:

23 Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain:

Acts II. 22. WHEN Peter had quoted the passage in Joel, mentioned above, as referring to the days of the Messiah, he added, Ye men of Israel, let me charge it upon you, that ye hear these words with an attention proportionable to the importance of them: You cannot but remember, that there hath lately appeared amongst you a celebrated person, called Jesus the Nazarene; a man who was approved and recommended to you by God himself, by those powerful operations, and wonders, and signs, which God wrought by him in the midst of you, in your most public places and assemblies; as ye yourselves have seen, and cannot take upon you to deny but that ye also know: Yet you were so far from paying him any becoming regard, that you entered into an impious and ungrateful conspiracy against his life; and have in prosecution thereof seized him, even this illustrious prophet, being given up into your hands, by the determinate counsel and prescience of God, who well knew what treatment he would meet a Recommended to you.] Ἀποθέωσαι, pointed out to you as the object of your most respectful regards.

b Prescience of God.] Groitus, as well as Beza, observes, that προφητεύω must here signify decree; and Eisner has shewn, it has that significance in approved Greek writers. And it is certain, ἄρα προφητεύω signifies one given up into the hands of the enemy. See Eisner, and Raphel, in loc. c By meet with from you, and for wise and good reasons permitted it to be: Him, I say, by the hands of Gentile sinners, with public ignominy you have fastened [to the cross] and slain, as if he had been the meanest and vilest of malefactors.

But be it known unto you, that God hath abundantly vindicated the honour of this his dear Son, whom you had thus infamously abused, and hath borne a most glorious testimony to his innocence, truth, and dignity; for it is he whom God hath raised up from the dead, by a miraculous effort of his divine power, having loosed the bonds in which he lay, when the pains of death had done their work upon him; as indeed it was impossible, all things considered, that he should finally be held under the power of it.

For David saith concerning him, when he is speaking in the person of the Messiah, (Psal. xvi. 8 & seq.) "I have regarded the Lord as always before me," with an assurance that in the greatest trials I am called to, he will continually where, that the apostle does not make David to speak these things, first of himself, and then of the Messiah, only in a secondary sense, but quotes them as referring to Christ alone.

I have regarded the Lord as always before me.] The sixteenth psalm, from whence this quotation is taken, cannot without great difficulty be wholly explained, as spoken in the person of the Messiah; and yet it is very hard to say, on that supposition, where he is first introduced as speaking. We might have imagined the sense of the 10th verse to have been, "I am persuaded thou wilt not leave my soul in hell because thou wilt not suffer Christ shine Holy One to see corruption in the grave; and, by what thou wilt do for him in raising him up, thou wilt give me a security of my own resurrection." This, I say, might have seemed an easy solution, did not the apostle in the 31st verse, refer both the clauses to Christ. I therefore suppose the transition to be made immediately after the 7th verse of the psalm, and to express the invention which David received from God, in a revelation concerning the Messiah made to him in the night-season; when, perhaps, he had some vision, in which he heard him speak the following words.—The passage is here quoted in the words of the Greek translation, something different from the Hebrew; but the sense is much the same.

Thou 24 Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it.

25 For David speaketh concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved.
For he spake not of himself, but of Christ...

26 Therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad: moreover also, my flesh shall rest in hope:

27 Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

28 Thou hast made known to me the ways of life: thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance.

29 Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day:

(Thou wilt not leave my soul in the unseen world.] Beza (to guard against the Popish doctrine of Christ's descent into hell,) would render the words as they stand in the Hebrew, הַלָּא הַשָּׂרָה מֵאָדָם, my corpse in the grave: And it is certain that מַפָּשַׁק and פָּשַׁק have sometimes these significations: (see Whitby, and Beza in loc.) and the phrase of bringing a person's life down to the grave, or up from it, often occurs. (Compare Psal. xxx. 3, xlix. 15, lxxvi. 13, lxxxviii. 3, lxxix. 28.) But as יְרוּם which is the word here used, can hardly be thought to signify a dead body and as is generally put for the state of separate spirits, (see note f on Mat. xvi. 18, p. 462,) the version here given seemed preferable to any other; nor can any just inference be drawn from it, in favour of Christ's descent into the hell of the damned.

Jerome
He therefore could not say this of himself; but being a divinely inspired prophet, and knowing that God had, in a special revelation from heaven, solemnly sworn to him with an oath, that of the fruit of his loins, or out of his descendants, he would, according to the flesh, when he should send his Son into the world in the human nature, raise up the promised Messiah, to sit on his throne, and to inherit universal empire; great event, by divine inspiration spoke the words which I have now been repeating; not meaning them of himself, or intending they should be taken in any lower sense, but referring them to the resurrection of the Messiah; thereby plainly signifying, that his soul should not be left in the unseen world, nor his flesh be suffered to see corruption.

This very Jesus then, whom we assert to be the true Messiah, God hath now raised up according to the tenor of this promise; of which resurrection, astonishing as it may seem, all we his apostles are witnesses, on our own personal and certain knowledge; having seen him with our eyes, and examined into the truth of the matter with all possible care. And more than this, we solemnly assure you, that mean and contemptible as this Jesus once appeared among you, he is invested now with sovereign dominion; and being exalted therefore to supreme majesty and glory at the right hand of God, and having, as the great anointed of the Lord, received the promise of the Holy Spirit from the Father, he hath, agreeable to the notices he gave us

Jerome mentions the remains of David's sepulchre as extant in his name; (Hier. Eccl. vii. 16. ed. Marcell.) and a large account of other testimonies concerning it may be seen in Fabricius. (Cod. Apoc. Vet. Test. p. 1063—1070.) It is strange that this sepulchre, should have survived so much barbarous rage, as we know Jerusalem was often subjected to: but perhaps, it was rebuilt in later days. As for the treasures, which Josephus so often mentions as found in this sepulchre by Hyrcanus and Herod, (Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 15, &c. [al. 12.]) § 2; lib. xiii. cap. 8, &c. [al. 16.]) § 1—6; lib. xv. cap. 7, &c. [al. 11.] § 1—8; Bell. Jud. lib. 1. cap. 2. § 5. However. I think with Beza, the stories have an air of fable.

According to the flesh.] This is expressed in the original in such a manner, with an article prefixed, (γις κοιτημενων αναστησεως του Χριστου,) as seems to refer these words, not to the bones of David, but to Christ; and so may be an intimation, that it was only with respect to his human nature that the Messiah should descend from David, while there was still a higher nature in which he was superior to him, and was indeed to be regarded as the Son of God. (Compare Rom. 1. 3, 4.) It was with a view to this, that Clarus and some others suppose these words to be inserted here by the apostle; and I have therefore so disposed them in the version, as to leave no room for any ambiguity.

k Until
God had exalted him, and made him Lord and Christ.

us before his ascension, which happened but ten days ago, shed forth this miraculous effusion of it which has produced the wonderful effects that you now see and hear, and which is given us as an holy unction from above, by which he constitutes us ministers in his church below.

And indeed it appears from other passages of his writings, that the great patriarch, whom I mentioned before, had some views to this kingdom of the Messiah: for David, who has never yet been raised from the dead is not himself ascended into heaven in the body, to be advanced there to the highest dignity and power; but plainly intimates, that this belonged to one superior to himself, when he says, (Psal. cx. 1.) "The Lord Jehovah said unto my Lord, that is God the Father said unto the Messiah; (whom though in one sense he is to be my Son, I honour as my Lord,) Sit thou exalted on a throne at my right hand, Until I make all that are so presumptuous as to go on to be thine enemies thy footstool and lay them prostrate at thy feet, so that thou mayest trample upon them at pleasure, as entirely subdued."

Therefore upon the whole, from this concur rent evidence both of prophecy and miracle, and from the testimony God has given to that Jesus whom we preach, not only by his resurrection from the dead, but by the effusion of the Holy Spirit on his followers, let all the house of Israel assuredly know how contrary soever it may be to their former apprehensions and rooted prejudices that God hath made this Jesus, whom you rejected and crucified, that Lord and that Messiah whose kingdom you profess so eagerly to desire, and who will surely come to execute his wrath upon you, if you are still so obstinate as to continue in your sins.

Thus Peter concluded his discourse, and God blessed it as the means of awakening and converting thousands, as we shall see in the following section.

34 For David is not ascended into the heavens: but he saith himself, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand.

35 Until I make thy foes thy footstool.

36 Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ.

\[ Until I make thine enemies thy footstool.\]
This text is quoted on this occasion with the happiest address, as suggesting, in the words of David, their great prophetic monarch, bow certain their own ruin must be, if they went on to oppose Christ.—Elsner has a fine collection of ancient passages, referring to the custom of trampling upon the vanquished, dead or alive.
IMPROVEMENT.

Let us firmly believe the wisdom of the divine counsels, and humbly adore the depths of them; according to which, without the least violation of that human freedom on which the morality of our actions depends, those events happen which the wickedness of men as really effects, as if Providence were wholly unconcerned in them.

Let us thankfully own the riches of that grace which gave our Lord Jesus Christ to be a sacrifice for us; and then raised him triumphant from the grave, to reign at the right hand of the Majesty on high, far above all principality, and power, and might. (Heb. i. 3. and Ephes. i. 21.) In him the prophecies are accomplished:

His soul was not left in hell, nor did he so much as see corruption in the grave. And we may consider his resurrection as a pledge given us for our assurance, that God will not abandon us in that ruinous state, to which his righteous sentence for a while brings our bodies. He will at length redeem them from the power of the grave: (Hosea xiii. 14) He will show us also the path of life, which our Redeemer hath trodden, and by treading, has marked out for us; and will conduct us to his right hand, where Jesus reigns, and with him everlasting pleasure. In him therefore let our heart be glad, and in him let our tongue rejoice; and when it is thus employed, it will indeed be the glory of our frame. (Psal. xvi. 9.)

In this hope let our flesh rest; nor let our faith stagger at the promise of God, as if any thing could be hard to Omnipotence. (Rom. iv. 20, 21.)

In the mean time, beholding this wonderful effusion of the Spirit as the blessed consequence of the ascension and exaltation of Christ, let us, with that affection which becomes his disciples, take our part in his glory and joy. Let us triumph in the thought, that God hath now said unto him, Sit thou at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool. And while we rejoice in the security which we have as his friends, let us pray that the blessed time may come, when every opposing power shall be brought down, and when we shall see that sight for which our eyes so long have been waiting, even all things put under his feet. (1. Cor. xv. 25, 27.) Hasten, O Lord, that glorious day, and whatever our station or furniture is, may we be honoured as the happy instruments of doing something, whether by life or by death, in subserviency to this great design!
Great numbers are converted by Peter's discourse, and, being immediately baptized, signalise themselves by their piety and mutual affection, which produces a farther increase in the church. Acts II. 37, to the end.

Acts II. 37.

THUS Peter addressed himself to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, arguing from the miraculous communication of the Spirit, that Jesus, being risen from the dead, was declared by God to be the promised Messiah, and charging them on this incontestable evidence with the aggravated guilt of being his betrayers and murderers. Now when they heard these things they were pierced to the heart with deep and lively sorrow, and felt such a conviction of their enormous guilt, in the injuries and indignities which they had offered to this glorious, this divine person, that with the utmost eagerness and solicitude they cried out, and said to Peter and the rest of the apostles, Men [and] brethren what shall we do?

And Peter said unto them, Through the divine goodness still continued to you, your case is not yet desperate: Repent therefore of this aggravated crime, and in token of your desire to be washed from the guilt of that blood, which you have so rashly imprecated upon yourselves and your children, (Mat. xxvii. 25.) be each of you baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, in order to the forgiveness of that and all [your] other sins; and you not only shall obtain the free and full remission of them all, but also...

[a] Repent, and be each of you baptized.] They are not only called here to repent, but a submission also to the ordinance of baptism is required of them, in order to the forgiveness of their sins: for though on their repeating and believing they were, according to the tenor of the gospel covenant, intitled to the remission of their sins; yet, as Christ had for wise reasons appointed this solemn rite, as a token of their taking up the Christian profession in a public manner, there could have been no sufficient evidence of the truth of their repentance and faith, if this precept of Christ had not been obeyed.

[b] In the name of Jesus Christ.] The learned Vitringa has taken a great deal of pains to shew, that the phrases βαπτιζομεν τοις Χριστου tois Christou, tois omoi Xristou, tois omatei Xristou, and eti omoi Xristou, have different significations; and labours to prove that the last phrase (which is here used) signifies, not only (as Le Clerc understands it,) being numbered among those who are called by his name, but professing to devote themselves to the glory of it. See Vitring. Observ. Sacra. lib. iii. cap. 22.

[c] The
also shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit by which he will own the work of his grace upon your hearts, and qualify you for serving that Lord whom you have crucified. For the promise of the Spirit is made, as you see in the forecited passage from Joel, (ver. 17, 18.) to you, and to your children, whom God is ready to admit to the same privilege with you; and not only so, but it extends to the remotest nations, to all that are afar off, as well as to them that are near, even to as many as the Lord our God shall call by the preaching of his gospel; which shall be propagated to the ends of the earth, and receive glorious attestations every where, by the effusion of the like miraculous gifts as we have received on many, and by the communication of the inward graces of the Spirit unto all who shall become obedient to the faith.

40 Thus Peter addressed himself to the multitude and with many other words he bore his testimony to these important truths, and earnestly exhorted them to an immediate consideration of the danger of persisting in their infidelity; saying in the conclusion of all, See that you lay these things to heart, receiving them with such regard as the importance of the case requires; renounce that obstinate unbelief in which you joined with those who crucified Christ, and be ye saved from that ruin which will quickly come upon this perverse and depraved generation.

41 And the exhortation was not in vain; for many were awakened and wrought upon by it. They therefore who received his word with readiness, were baptized: thereby taking upon them the public profession of faith in Jesus as the Messiah: And there were added to the number [of the disciples] that very day about three thousand souls.

e The promise is to you, and to your children.] Considering that the gift of the Spirit had been mentioned just before, it seems most natural to interpret this, as a reference to that passage in Joel, which had been so largely recited above, (ver. 17, &c.) where God promises the effusion of the Spirit on their sons and their daughters: And accordingly I have paraphrased the latter clause of this verse as referring to its extraordinary gifts, and the rather, as the sanctifying influence of the Spirit must already have been received, to prepare them for entering into the church by baptism. But, if the promise be interpreted as referring to a remoter clause, the forgiveness of their sins, this whole verse must be taken in a greater latitude, as referring to the encouragement which all future converts and their children had, to expect the benefit of the gospel: In which view, I think it would much favour infant-baptism, as many writers on the subject have largely shewn.

6 To all that are afar off.] Since Peter knew nothing as yet of the intended calling of the Gentiles, he could only mean by this, that the gospel should be preached to all the dispersed of Israel in distant nations: But the Spirit of God might have a farther view.

He exhorts them to repent and be baptized.
sand souls. Nor was this only a transport of sudden passion, with which they were affected only for the present, with an impression that quickly wore off: but on the contrary, it produced the most solid and lasting effects. And notwithstanding all the apparent danger to which they were exposed, they continued steadfast in their attendance on the word which the apostles preached, and resolutely adhered to their doctrine: And though many of them that believed were such as had come thither out of foreign countries, who would otherwise have returned home immediately after the feast, they staid a considerable time longer at Jerusalem, to be more thoroughly instructed in the Christian faith; and they all lived in the most endearing fellowship and intimate friendship with each other, and particularly expressed their mutual affection in breaking of bread together, and joining in the exercise of social prayer. And many others who were not converted, when they took notice of this wonderful effect of the apostles' preaching, were mightily struck and impressed with the thought of it; so that a reverential fear and inward dread fell upon every soul, and spread itself over the whole city and neighbourhood, at the sight of so unexampled an event, and was this only a transport of sudden passion, with which they were affected only for the present, with an impression that quickly wore off: but on the contrary, it produced the most solid and lasting effects. And notwithstanding all the apparent danger to which they were exposed, they continued steadfast in their attendance on the word which the apostles preached, and resolutely adhered to their doctrine: And though many of them that believed were such as had come thither out of foreign countries, who would otherwise have returned home immediately after the feast, they staid a considerable time longer at Jerusalem, to be more thoroughly instructed in the Christian faith; and they all lived in the most endearing fellowship and intimate friendship with each other, and particularly expressed their mutual affection in breaking of bread together, and joining in the exercise of social prayer. 42 And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers.

43 And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles.

There were added—that very day about three thousand souls.] It is commonly said, that all these were converted by one sermon. But it is probable, that, while Peter was preaching in the Syriac language, the other apostles were preaching at some small distance, much to the same purpose, in other languages; and it is not surely to be imagined, that none of them but Peter should be blessed as the means of converting any soul; not to insist upon it, that he himself might deliver several discourses this day to different auditories, when the concourse of people was so great and their languages so various. It will not be improper to add, that apostolikos emphatically signifies to pass over to a body of men, as Bos, Raphelius, and Elnser have shewn; and that Elnser has shewn at large, in a very curious note on this clause, not only, (as Gataker, Raphelius, and many others have,) that souls often signifies persons in the Greek and Latin classics; but also, that Jamblichus in his Life of Pythagoras has exactly imitated this passage, in the account he gives of that philosopher's success in Italy, as proselyting two thousand by one discourse, engaging them to continue with him, frequently worshipping in the temples, and sharing their goods in common, as these primitive Christians did: Facts, of which we have no manner of convincing evidence, and which were probably intended to stir Christianity by an invidious comparison. (Elen. Observ. Vol. I. p. 373, 376.) Compare Vol. II. Sect. 90. note c. p. 471.

They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine. This may intimate, on the one hand, that many efforts were made to shake their resolution; and on the other, that upon fuller inquiry they found all things, as the apostles had represented.

In breaking of bread. Though we have great reason to believe, that the eucharist was often celebrated among these primitive converts, perhaps much earlier than every Lord's day, yet I cannot see reason to conclude with Suicer, (Theos. Eccles. Vol. II. p. 105,) Lightfoot, Pearson, and many others, that this phrase must here refer to it, since it may undoubtedly signify common meals, as Casaubon, Grotius, Wolfius, and several others have shewn; and in this sense the phrase is used, Luke xxiv. 35, where it is plain the eucharist could not be intended.
They sell their possessions, and have all things in common.

event, which they apprehended might be the fore-runner of some public calamity, on those who had slain that Jesus, of whom it was declared by his disciples, that it was all effected by his power: And the consternation was farther increased, as many miracles and signs, which plainly shewed an extraordinary divine interposition, were wrought by the apostles in his name.

44 And all that believed were together meeting as frequently as possible in the same place; and such were their mutual affection and love to each other, that they had all things in common.

45 And this generous principle went so far, that they who had estates, or any other valuable substance, sold their possessions and effects, and readily divided the price of them to all their brethren, as every one had particular necessity.

46 [Compare chap. iv. 34, 35. And they continued resolutely and unanimously in the temple, at the appointed hours of public worship every day: And at other times they associated, as frequently as they could, breaking bread from house to house, each family making entertainments for their brethren, especially for those who were sojourners in Jerusalem: And they partook of their common refreshment, with the greatest

b In the same place.] Dr. Whitby pleads that, as they were at least three thousand one hundred and twenty, they could not be in the same place, and therefore would understand it of communion in the same action. He would rather render it, (as our translation does,) they were together; and produces several places from the Septuagint to this purpose, as Ezr iv. 5; Psal xliv. 2; Isa. lxvi. 17; Jer. vi. 12, &c. But as it generally signifies an assembly in the same place, and many larger assemblies than of three or four thousand people are held, it seemed best to render it thus, only qualifying it as in the paraphrase, especially as it is only has plainly this sense, ver. 1.

1 Had all things in common.] Peculiar reasons made this community of goods eligible at that time, not only as so many sojourners, who had come from other parts, would justly be desirous to continue at Jerusalem, much longer than they intended when they came to the feast, that they might get a thorough knowledge of the gospel, but as the prospect likewise of the Roman Conquests, which according to Christ's known prediction were soon to swallow up all Jewish property, would o course dispose many more readily to sell their lands. But the New Testament abounds with passages, which plainly shew, this was never intended for a general practice.—None can reasonably imagine, that the number of Christian converts, even then at Jerusalem, is to be accounted for by a desire to share in these divided goods: For it is evident, that as the portion each could have would be very small, so the hardships to be endured for a Christian profession would soon counterbalance such advantages; and accordingly we find, the converts at Jerusalem were soon reduced to such necessitous circumstances, as to need relief by the contributions of their Gentile brethren. Candour would rather lead me to argue the incontestable evidence of the gospel, from its prevailing on the professors of it to part with their estates, to relieve persons, who, excepting the community of their faith, had no particular claim to their regards. If such instances were numerous, this argument is strengthened in proportion: and, if they be supposed few, the objection is proportionally weakened.
Reflections on the great success of the apostles' preaching.

47 Praising God, and having favour with all the people. And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved.

FAITHFUL are the wounds of a friend: and far more beautiful than a jewel of gold, or an ornament of fine gold, is a wise reprover on a obedient ear (Prov. xxvii. 6; xxv. 12.) Happy are they who feel such an holy compunction of soul as these penitents did! Salvation is come to their house, and though they sow in tears they shall reap in joy. (Psal. cxxvi. 5.) What reason have we for thankfulness, that when we are crying out, What shall we do? the gospel gives us so ready an answer, and directs us to faith and repentance, as the sure way by which we may obtain the remission of our sins, and at length rise to an inheritance among them that are sanctified. Let us rejoice, that the promise is to us, and to our seed: and that the important blessings of it will run down from generation to generation. And let all the ardour of our souls be awakened to secure these blessings, and to be saved from that ruin in which we shall otherwise be involved with the crooked and perverse generation among which we live.

Glorious effect of this convincing and excellent discourse, when three thousand were in one day added to the church! three thousand who not only expressed some present good impressions and resolutions, but continued steadfast in the religion they had embraced, and sacrificed all their worldly interests to it. How glorious an earnest of the future success of the gospel! How great an encouragement to the apostles, in all the difficulties they were to encounter; and how convincing a proof to all ages of its truth: since all these proselytes were made upon the spot, where if it had been false, it is impossible it should have been believed by any one rational rational inquirer, how mean soever his capacity, or how low soever his rank in life had been.

Let us reflect with pleasure on the happy change produced in the character and state of these converts: Bitter as the first pangs of their convictions were, anguish soon yielded to delight: Pardon of sin, and the hope of glory added a relish before unknown to the supports of nature, the accommodations of life, and the endearments of friendship. Whilst their hearts were opened in sentiments of gratitude to God, who had provided a laver for their crimson sins, which rendered them like wool and like snow; and to that Redeemer, who had saved them by that blood which they had cruelly and impiously shed; they were also dilated in liberality and bounty; and they undoubtedly found a rich equivalent for all the worldly possessions which they resigned, in that holy joy which sprang up in their souls, when the treasures of the gospel were open to them, and dealt out with so generous a hand.

So may the kingdom of Christ spread and flourish in the souls of men! So may that blessed time come, when through the operation of the same Spirit, (for that Spirit is for ever the same,) nations shall be born in a day. Let us not despair; the morning was glorious, and in the even tide it shall be light. (Zech. xiv. 7.) In the mean time, let us thankfully own whatever progress Christianity may be making amongst us, or others, though by slow degrees; and acknowledge, that it is the great Lord of the church who, by his secret but powerful influence adds unto its respective societies such as shall be saved. May the additions every where be numerous, and may the great Author of all good be more thankfully owned in them all.

SECT. VI.

Peter and John, quickly after the feast of Pentecost, cure a man who had been lame from his birth, at the temple-gate, which occasions a great concourse of admiring spectators. Acts III. 1—11.

Acts III. 1.

NOW while the church was in the flourishing state described above, an extraordinary circumstance happened, which tended still more to increase its numbers and reputation: For on a certain day, about that time, Peter and John went

* About that time.] Thus I would choose, with Grotius, to render the words \textit{et propter} at the beginning of this chapter, as it does not seem to suit so well with the original.
Hour of prayer, being the ninth hour.

2 And a certain man lame from his mother's womb was carried, whom they laid daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered into the temple:

3 Who seeing Peter and John about to go into the temple, asked alms.

4 And Peter fastening his eyes upon him, with a kind, to take them to imply no more, than that Peter and John went up together to the temple. I see no reason to suppose with Dr. Lightfoot, that this happened the same days, on which the Spirit was miraculously poured out, or to conclude with others, that it was not till the next year, or at least several months after. The time is no where determined: but it appears most probable, that it was soon after the feast of Pentecost. Compare note on Acts iv. 8. § 8.

b At the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour. It may suffice once for all to observe, that the Jews divided the time, from the rising to the setting of the sun, into twelve hours, which were consequently, at different times of the year, of unequal length, as the days were longer or shorter. When we say therefore, (as we often do in this work,) that the third hour was about nine in the morning, the ninth about three in the afternoon, &c. we are not to be understood to speak with the utmost exactness. The third hour was the middle space between sun-rising and noon, which, if the sun rose at five, was half an hour after eight, if at seven, was half an hour after nine, &c.

And a certain man, well known among them that frequented the place, who had been lame from his mother's womb, by a weakness in his ankles, which rendered him incapable of walking, was carried slither by the help of others; whom they daily brought and laid down at the eastern gate of the temple, which is called the Beautiful gate, being made of Corinthian brass and richly adorned with the most curious workmanship: and here he lay, to ask alms of those that entered into the temple to pay their devotion there, as such charitable actions seem peculiarly suitable, when men are going to make their supplications to the God of mercy; and the relief that he obtained here was the only means he had for his subsistence. Such was the case of this poor cripple, who seeing Peter and John about to go into the temple, applied himself to them among the rest, and begged to receive an alms of them. But Peter, being then (as was observed before) with John the beloved disciple, felt at that time a strong emotion of soul, which intimated to him, that the divine energy was then Peter miraculously cures a man lame from his birth.

Then to be displayed in the illustrious miracle to be wrought by his means: and turning therefore to the poor man, and looking stedfastly upon him he said, Look upon us. And accordingly he fixed his eyes upon them as expecting to receive something from them for the relief of his necessities. But Peter, under the divine impulse, intended him a far more important favour; and therefore said, As for silver and gold, I have none of either to impart to thee, were I ever so free to do it; but what I have in my power I willingly give thee; and thou shalt find it not less valuable: I say unto thee, therefore, in the great and prevailing name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, and as a proof that he is indeed the Messiah, rise up and walk. And Peter taking him by the right hand, encouraged him to do as he had said, and raised him up: And immediately on his speaking this, and touching him, his feet and his ankle bones, which had before been disabled, were in an extraordinary manner strengthened and reduced to their proper situation.

And leaping up from the place where he lay, he first stood in an erect posture, which he had never before been able to do, and then walked about with strength and steadiness, and entered with them into the court of the temple, there to offer his first fruits of thanksgiving; sometimes walking, and sometimes leaping for joy, and in a rapture of astonishment and thankfulness, praising God so for singular a mercy manifested to him. (Compare Isa. xxxv. 6.)

And all the people who were there present, saw him thus walking in the court of the temple and the cloyster adjacent to it, and heard him praising God with this uncommon ecstasy of delight: And they knew him perfectly well, that this was he who had sat so long at the Beautiful gate of the temple to beg for alms of those that entered in and came out: And they were filled with awful astonishment, and felt in themselves likewise a kind of joyful ecstasy, something resembling his, at that miraculous event which had befallen him.

And

[Silver and gold I have none.] This was after the estates were sold, (chap. ii. 45,) and plainly shows, how far the apostles were from enriching themselves by the treasures which passed through their hands, as Mr. Reynolds well observes in his Letters to a Deist, No. iii. p. 242. By his mentioning gold as well as silver, (which a beggar like this could not expect to receive,) he probably meant to speak of himself as continuing still a poor man, and not merely to say, that he had no gold about him.

c Kept
And, upon this, while the lame man who was thus wonderfully healed, full of the tenderest sentiments of gratitude, still kept his hold of Peter and John, and walked on between them, sometimes taking them by the hand, and sometimes embracing them as his great benefactors and the means of his deliverance; all the people in the neighbouring parts, alarmed with so strange a story, ran together to them in great amazement to the spacious and celebrated portico of the temple, which (for reasons elsewhere assigned) was called Solomon's portico. And Peter observing the great concourse of people, and finding that they were exceeding affected with the miracle which had been wrought, took that opportunity of having a very instructive discourse to them, which will be recorded in the ensuing section.

IMPROVEMENT.

Happy are those souls, who are so formed for devotion, that the proper returning seasons of it, whether public or private, Ver. are always welcome! Doubly delightful that friendship, which, I like this of Peter and John, is endeared not only by taking sweet counsel together, but by going to the house of God in company! (Psal. lv. 14.)

If we desire this devotion should be acceptable, let us endeavour not only to lay aside all the malignant passions, and to lift up holy hands without wrath; (1 Tim. ii. 8.) but let us stretch out our hands in works of benevolence and kindness. To our piety let us add the most diffusive charity which our circumstances will permit, 3, 4 and there are none, whose circumstances will forbid every exercise of it. As for those that have neither silver and gold, such as they have let them give.

These holy apostles, we see, had not enriched themselves by being intrusted with the distribution of those goods which were laid at their feet; but had approved themselves faithful stewards: The members of Christ were far dearer to them than any temporal interest of their own: and fatally, sure, would the church in all ages have been mistaken, if it had measured the worth of its pastors by their wealth. They bestowed nevertheless a much more valuable...

11 And as the lame man which was healed, held Peter and John, all the people ran together unto them in the porch that is called Solomon's greatly wondering.

6 Kept his hold of Peter and John.] Perhaps fearing his lameness should return, if he lost sight of them, as Beza and others have observed.

4 The portico called Solomon's.] The reason why it was so called, and what a sort of building it was, may be seen in note b on John x. 23, p. 88. To which we may add, that this is said to have been the only part of the temple, which was not destroyed by the Chaldeans.

valuable bounty: And if it be more desirable to heal men’s bodies than to enrich them, how much more advantageous is it to be the instrument of healing their souls? which, if it be ever accomplished, must surely be in the same name, even that of Jesus of Nazareth. May he strengthen the feeble powers of fallen nature, while we are attempting to raise men up; and may spiritual health and vigour, when restored, be improved, like the cure wrought on this lame man, in the service of God, and a thankful acknowledgment of his goodness.

We are not to wonder, that, as the name of Jesus, their great deliverer, is incomparably precious to all that truly believe, such have also some peculiarly tender friendships for the persons, by whose means he has wrought this good work upon them. May many such friendships be formed now, and he perfected in glory; and in the mean time, may the ministers of Christ be watching every opportunity of doing good, and especially when they see men under any lively impressions which tend towards religion! May they have that holy mixture of zeal and prudence, which taught the apostles how to speak a word in season; a word which proved so remarkably good, and was owned by God in so singular a manner, for the conversion and salvation of multitudes that heard it!

SECT. VII.

Peter makes a most affectionate discourse to the people assembled in the temple, on occasion of the cure of the lame man. Acts III. 12, to the end.

Acts III. 12.

THE miraculous cure of the lame man at the Beautiful gate of the temple was presently reported in the city, and occasioned (as we have seen before) a vast concourse of people, who ran together to the temple, and gathered in crowds about Peter and John, astonished at so marvellous a cure, and eager to behold the persons who had wrought it. And Peter seeing [this] was ready to improve it as a proper opportunity of renewing his address to them, upon that important errand with which, as an apostle of Jesus, he was charged; accordingly he answered those of the people who were there assembled, and were earnestly inquiring into the circumstances of the fact, in the following manner.

Ye men of Israel, why do you wonder so at this which has now happened, when so much greater miracles

Acts. III. 12.

AND when Peter saw it, he answered unto the people,—

—Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this?
miracles have lately been performed among you? or why do you fix your eyes so earnestly on us, with that astonishment which your looks express, as if it were by our own power, or by any peculiar piety and holiness of ours, that we had made this poor man able to walk? We would by no means take the honour of this miracle to ourselves, but would direct your views unto the great original of all, even the \[\text{God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, whom we adore and reverence as the God of our fathers?}\] and would have you to consider what has now happened, as a signal proof that he hath glorified his Son Jesus, and given all power into his hands, even that Jesus whom ye, kind as his design and exemplary as his life was, ungratefully delivered up to the Roman power as a criminal, and treated with such vile contempt, as that you openly renounced and refused to accept of him in the presence of Pilate, when he was satisfied of his innocence, and determined to release him. But you, I say, renounced the Holy and Righteous One, declaring that you would not own him as your king, nor even be contented to admit of his discharge, when it was offered by the Roman governor, and pressed upon you; and were so set against him, that with outrageous clamour you desired rather that Barabbas, one of the most infamous of mankind, a robber and a murderer, might be granted and released unto you: And while you asked for the deliverance of so vile a wretch, you inhumanly and insolently killed him who is the great author and Prince of life, the only person who had power to conduct you to it; Whom nevertheless God has amply vindicated, having raised him up from the dead; of which we his apostles are witnesses, upon a repeated testimony of our own senses, in circumstances in which it was impossible that they should be deceived.

b Killed the Prince of life.] Even him, to whom the Father had given to have life in himself, (John v. 26.) and whom he had appointed to conduct his followers to life and glory. The contrast between their killing such a person, and interceding for the pardon of a murderer, a destroyer of life has a peculiar energy.

\[\text{The God of our fathers.}]\] This was wisely introduced here in the beginning of his discourse, that it might appear, they taught no new religion, inconsistent with the Mosaic, and were far from having the least design to divert their regards from the God of Israel.—For the force of the word ἐγκαταστάσατο, which we have rendered renounced, see Heins. Exercit. Sacr. p. 254, 455.

The cure of the lame man was wrought by faith in Christ. 531 deceived. And God is still continuing to heap new honours upon him, whom you have treated with so much infamy; for be it known unto you, it is by faith in his name that he hath strengthened this poor man, whom you see here before you, and whom you know to have been unable from his birth to walk: [Yeα] I repeat it again, as what highly concerns you all to know and regard, It is his name, and the faith which is centred in him, and which derives its efficacy from his power, that has given him this perfect strength and soundness, which he now manifests before you all.

17 And now, brethren, while I am urging this for your conviction, that I may lead you to repent of your great wickedness in crucifying so excellent and so divine a person, I would not aggravate the crime you have been guilty of beyond due bounds, so as to drive you to despair; as I know that it was through ignorance of his true character, that you did [it,] as [did] also your rulers,’ by whom you were led on and prompted to it: For surely, if the dignity and greatness of his person, and his divine authority and mission had been known, both you and they must have treated him in a very different manner. (Compare 1 Cor. ii. 8.) But God permitted this that you have done, and overruled it for wise and gracious purposes; and hath thus fulfilled those things which he so plainly had foretold by the mouth of all his prophets in the various ages of the world: even that Christ should suffer, as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of his people. (Compare Acts xiii. 27.)

19 See to it therefore, that it be your immediate care to secure an interest in the benefits purchased by his death: And to this purpose let us exhort you to repent of your iniquities, and with a sense of what you have done amiss to turn to God in the way of sincere and universal obedience, that so your sins may be blotted out, and

And his name, through faith in his name, hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know: yea, the faith which is by him, hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all.

17 And now, brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers.

18 But those things which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled.

19 Repent ye therefore, and be converted that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord.

And by faith in his name he hath strengthened, &c.] The construction of the original as it is commonly pointed, is so exceedingly perplexed, that Heinsius’s manner of pointing seems greatly to be preferred. He places a period after eti-w7, referring that verb to ζεέεες in the preceding verse, and to ζεέεες in the latter clause of this.

Through ignorance you did it, &c.] Probably, if it had not been so, they would have been immediately destroyed, or reserved to vengeance without any offer of pardon. Yet it is plain, their ignorance, being in itself highly criminal amidst such means of information, did not excuse them from great guilt.

That
These things had been foretold by Moses and the prophets.

20 And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you:

21 Whom the heaven must receive, until the times of restitution of all things, which God had spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets, since the world began.

and you may be delivered from the heavy burden of your guilt; that seasons of sacred refreshment and delight may come upon you from the presence of the Lord: And that in consequence of your complying with this important counsel, you may not only be received to all the joys of a state of pardon and divine acceptance, but he may at length send unto you this Jesus Christ who was so long before appointed by God to this blessed purpose, and represented and proclaimed under such a variety of symbols as the great Saviour of lost sinners; that having triumphed over all his enemies, and accomplished all the prophecies as to the prosperity and glory of his church on earth, he may finally receive you and all his faithful servants to complete and eternal happiness above. Submit yourselves this day then to this glorious Redeemer, whom you must not indeed expect, as immediately to appear in person among you; for heaven must continue to receive and retain him, till the long expected and happy times of the regulation of all things, that is, till the great appointed day, when God will rectify all the seeming irregularities of his present dispensations, and make the cause of righteousness and truth for ever triumphant and glorious: Concerning, which [great events] (that is, that such a Saviour

• That seasons of refreshment may come, &c.] So it is that Tertullian, Luther, Heinsius, Lightfoot, De Dicu, and Raphaelius, (see Herod, p. 329.) I think very reasonably, render the words και σε αυτοις, &c. as the same phrase is used, Luke ii. 35, και αν αναληλυφησαι, &c. that the thoughts may be revealed; and Mat. vi. 5. και αν γνωρισουν, that they may be seen. (See also Acts xv. 17, and Rom. iii. 4.-Brasinus and Piscator render it, Seeing times of refreshment are come; and Beza, After that, or when they shall come: But the authorities produced in favour of this version seem not sufficient to justify it; nor was the blotting out the sins of penitents deferred to any distant time. Divine refreshment would no doubt, immediately mingle itself with a sense of pardon, and eternal happiness, would certainly at length succeed; but the following clause seems to intimate, that Peter apprehended the conversion of the Jews, as a people, would be attended with some extraordinary scene of prosperity and joy, and open a speedy way to Christ's descent from heaven, in order to the restitution of all things. I have the pleasure, since I wrote this, to find that the learned Vitringa agrees with me in this interpretation. Vitring. Obscr. Serr. lib. v. cap. 6, § 14. [Before appointed] Instead of προκειμενου, before preached, I here follow Beza in reading προκειμενου as Tertullian and several of the fathers quote it, and the Alexandrian and several other valuable manuscripts and ancient versions likewise have it; and then you must (as in this version) be referred to ταιοις, shall send to you, &c.

• The regulation of all things.] This αποκαθισταται may so well be explained of regulating the present disorders in the moral world, and the seeming irregularities of providential dispensations, that it is surprising to find Dr. Thomas Burnet, Mr. Whiston, and other learned writers, urging it for such a restoration of the paradisaical state of the earth, as they on their different hypotheses have ventured to assert, without any clear warrant from Scripture, and amidst a thousand difficulties which clog our conceptions of it. (Compare note on Mat. xvii. 11, p. 573.)

Saviour should be raised up, and should at length be fixed in universal dominion, and the like, God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets from the beginning of time.

22 For Moses, the first of these prophets whose writings are come down to us, has in the plainest terms, described him, when he said to the fathers in his early days, (Deut. xviii. 15, 18, 19.) "Surely a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, out of the families of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear and hearken to in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you."

23 Soever he shall say unto you: And it shall come to pass [that] every soul who will not hearken to that prophet, and be obedient to him, shall be cut off from among the people without mercy, and be made an example of the severest punishment due to such aggravated and ungrateful rebellion. Yea, and those that succeeded Moses, even all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as spoke any thing largely concerning the future purposes and schemes of divine Providence, have also foretold these important days, which, by the singular favour of God to you, ye are now so happy as to see.

25 Let us now, therefore, solemnly intreat you to regard and improve these declarations in a becoming h From the beginning of time.] See note b on Luke i. 70. Vol. i. p. 47.

1 Moses said to the fathers.] This quotation from Deut. xviii. 15, 18 seq. does in its primary sense refer to the Messiah, as Mr. Bullock and Mr. Jelfrey have excellently shewn; being, like Moses, not only a prophet, but a sovver, and a lawgiver too. On this scripture does Limborch chiefly build in that noble controversy of his with Orobio, most justly called Amico Collatio cum erudito Juda, which not only contains a variety of beautiful, and some of them very uncommon arguments, but is also on both sides so fine a model of a genteel and amicable manner of debating the most momentous question, as it would have been much for the credit of their religion and of themselves, if all other advocates for Christianity had followed. Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho is written with much of the same decent spirit, though by no means with equal compass and solidity of thought.

k Shall be cut off from among the people.] One cannot imagine a more masterly address than this, to warn the Jews of the dreadful consequence of their infidelity, in the very words of Moses, their favourite prophet, out of a pretended zeal for whom they were ready to reject Christianity, and to attempt its destruction. See above, sect. 4. note k, p. 519.

22 For Moses truly said unto the Fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

23 And it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people.

24 Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken have likewise foretold of these days,

25 Ye are the children
As children of the covenant, Jesus was first sent to them.

Imagery of the prophets and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed.

26 Unto you first, God having raised up his son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities.

Coming manner: for you have peculiar obligations to do it, as you are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God constituted of old with our fathers, saying to Abraham again and again, (Gen. xii. 3. xviii. 18. xxii. 18.) “And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed.” And accordingly this Messiah who was promised as so extensive and universal a blessing, has sprung from him; and to you first, God having raised up his child Jesus, from the loins of this pious patriarch, has sent him with ample demonstrations of his divine mission, lately in his own person, and now by our own ministry and the effusion of his Spirit, to offer pardon and salvation to you, and to bless you, every one of you turning from your iniquities; in which, though by profession you are God’s people, you have been so long indulging yourselves; nor are the vilest and most aggravated sinners among you excepted from the grace of such an invitation. Let it therefore be your most solicitous care, that this gracious message may not be addressed to you in vain.

Improvement.

Happy the minister whose heart is thus intent upon all opportunities of doing good, as these holy apostles were! Happy that faithful servant, who, like them, arrogates nothing to himself, but centers the praise of all in him who is the great source from whom every good and perfect gift proceeds! Happy the man who is himself willing to be forgotten and overlooked, that God may be remembered and owned! He, like this wise master builder, will lay the foundation deep in a sense of sin, and will charge it with all its aggravations on the sinner, that he may thereby render the tidings of a Saviour welcome; which they can never be till this burden has been felt. Yet will he, like Peter, conduct the charge with \[\text{To you first.}\]

Accordingly the gospel was (by the astonishing grace of our blessed Redeemer) everywhere offered first to the Jews. Had it been otherwise, humanly speaking, many who were converted in this method might have been exasperated and lost.

\[\text{Every one of you turning from your iniquities.}\]

That is, All those of you that turn from sin, shall be intituled to his blessing. This, which is just equivalent to Beza’s, seems a natural version of the words in τον εὐσεβίαν ἔμαρτο, &c. And I choose it, because it is plain, (as Oratio with his usual sagacity objects to Limborch,) that Christ did not in fact turn every one of them from their iniquities, though it must be allowed, that he took such steps as were very proper for that purpose; and the version seems farther preferable, as the apostle knew, that the Jews would in fact reject the gospel, and bring destruction on themselves as a nation by that means.

with tenderness and respect, and be cautious not to overload even the greatest offender.

Ver. We see the absolute necessity of repentance, which therefore is to be solemnly charged upon the consciences of all who desire that their sins may be blotted out of the book of God's remembrance, and that they may share in that refreshment which nothing but the sense of his pardoning love can afford. Blessed souls are they who have experienced it; for they may look upon all their present comforts as the dawning of eternal glory; and having seen Christ with an eye of faith, and received that important cure, which nothing but his powerful and gracious name can effect, may be assured that God will send him again to complete the work he had so graciously begun, and to reduce the seeming irregularities of the present state into everlasting harmony, order, and beauty.

13 In the mean time, let us adore the wisdom of his providence, and the fidelity of his grace, which has over-ruled the folly and wickedness of men, to subserve his own holy purposes, and has accomplished the promises so long since made of a prophet to be raised up to Israel like Moses, and indeed gloriously superior to him, both in the dignity of his character and office, and in the great salvation he was sent to procure.—This salvation was first offered to Israel, which had rendered itself so peculiarly unworthy by killing the Prince of life. Let us rejoice that it is now published to us, and that God has condescended to send his Son to bless us sinners of the Gentiles, in turning us from our iniquities. Let us view this salvation in its true light, and remember that if we are not willing to turn from iniquity, from all iniquity, from those iniquities that have been peculiarly our own, it is impossible we should have any share in it.

SECTION VIII.

The two apostles being seized by order of the Sanhedrim, and examined by them, courageously declare their resolution of going on to preach in the name of Jesus, notwithstanding their severest threatenings. Acts IV. 1.

HUS it was that Peter and John improved the opportunity of addressing themselves to the multitude, who had assembled in the temple (as we have seen before) upon occasion of the miraculous cure of the lame man; and while they were thus speaking to the people, a considerable number of the priests came upon them; and

Acts IV. 1.

A ND as they spake unto the people, the priests and the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees came upon them, and with the priests there came the captain of the temple, that is, the person who commanded the guard of Levites then in waiting; and the Sadducees also joined with them: For this sect of men were greatly exasperated against the apostles, being peculiarly grieved that they taught the people in the name of that Jesus whom they had so lately put to death, and especially that they preached the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, as exemplified and demonstrated in [the person of] Jesus; whose recovered life had so direct a tendency to overthrow the whole system of the Sadducean tenets, which denied every thing of that kind, yea even the existence of the soul after death, and any future account of the actions of life. (Compare Acts xxiii. 8.) And therefore, that they might prevent their preaching any more, they laid violent hands upon Peter and John, and seized them as seditious persons, who were labouring to incense the populace against the conduct of their governors; And they committed them into custody until the next day, that when the Sanhedrim met at the usual hour they might consult what it was proper to do with them; for it was now late in the evening, and was no fit season to have them examined.

But in the mean time, the disciples had the satisfaction to see, that the apostles had not laboured in vain; for many of those who had heard the word preached by them, believed; and the number of the men became about five thousand, including those who had been converted before, and still attended on the instructions of the apostles.

And
And the next day there was a general assembly of their rulers, and elders, and scribes, which constituted the Sanhedrim, who gathered together, and formed a court at Jerusalem: And there was with them Anias, who had formerly been the high priest, and Caiphas also who then bore that office, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the high-priest's kindred, who came and joined the council upon this occasion.

And having ordered the apostles to be brought before them, and set them in the midst of the assembly, (the place where criminals used to stand to be tried by their court) they inquired of them, saying, Declare to us truly, and without reserve, what is the bottom of this affair? By what power, or in the authority of what name, have you done this strange work, which has been wrought on the cripple now healed? Is it by the art of medicine, or by magic? Or do you pretend to any prophetic mission, in attestation of which this is done?

Then

and to suppose they did not teach publicly would be most absurd.

Annas the high-priest, and Caiphas.]

As it seems evident, that Caiphas was the high-priest at this time, it may appear strange, that the title should be given to another, merely to signify that he, that is, the Annas spoken of, was that Annas who had once borne that office with great honour, and had now most of the authority, though his son-in-law Caiphas had the name. — I would submit it to examination, whether, placing a comma after Annas, the following words might not be joined, so a quo singit nomen Lucio, and rendered the high-priest also, that is, Caiphas; though I confess the insertion of copulative between each name in the following clauses does not favour such a version; and therefore I rather incline to acquiesce in the former solution; for the illustration of which, see Mr. Bisceo, at Boyle's Lect. p. 648—659.

John and Alexander.] It is very evident, these were persons of great note among the Jews at that time: and it is not improbable, that (as Dr. Lightfoot and others suppose) the former might be the celebrated Rabban Johanan ben Zacei, mentioned in the Talmud, the scholar of Hillel, and the latter might be the Abarch, or governor of the Jews at Alexandria, brother to the famous Philo Judaeus, and in great favour with Claudius Caesar.

As many as were of the high-priest's kindred.] Or as others render it, of the pontifical family. Dr. Hammond explains this of the twenty-four members of the Aaronic family, who presided over the twenty-four courses: Others refer it to those, who were nearly related to Annas and Caiphas: But Grotius thinks that it includes the kindred of those who had lately been in the office of high-priest, which (he says) made them members of the Sanhedrin. Who were properly members of that council, it is extremely difficult to say; but I cannot think with a late learned writer, (Mr. Bisceo, at Boyle's Lect. p. 79.) that the presence of Alexander (though stedfast resident in Egypt) will prove, that this was not properly the Sanhedrin, but an extraordinary council occasionally called, consisting of some who were, and others who were not, of that court. It is very evident, they act with authority as a court of judicature here, and the council, expressly called sanhedrus, again and again in the 5th chapter, (ver. 21, 27, 34, 41.) refer to the acts of this assembly as their own: (Compare chap. v. ver. 27, 28.) And the same word is likewise used here in this chapter, ver. 15.

5 And it came to pass on the morrow, that their rulers, and elders, and scribes, 6 And Annas the high-priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high-priest, were gathered together at Jerusalem.
8 Then Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost, said unto them; Ye rulers of the people, and elders of Israel,

Then Peter, full of the Holy Spirit, according to the promise of his now glorified Master, which was upon this occasion remarkably verified, (Compare Mat. x. 19, 20. and Mark xiii. 11.) spake with the utmost freedom, and said unto them, O ye rulers of the people, and elders of Israel, before whom we are now brought as malefactors! We are not conscious to ourselves, that we have done any thing to deserve censure or punishment; but if we are this day examined and called to an account as criminals, about the benefit conferred upon the impotent man, and you would have us to declare by what means he is saved from his calamitous state, and healed in the manner which you now see, we are most free to tell you what we before have testified on this occasion: (Chap. iii. 16:) Be it known therefore to you all, and to all the people of Israel, that it is by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole.

10 Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole.

11 This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner.

12 Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

8 Whom God hath raised from the dead.] They knew in their own consciences, that it was so; and, though they had hired the soldiers to tell a most senseless and incredible tale to the contrary, (Mat. xxviii. 12—15) yet it is observable, they did not (so far as we can learn) dare to plead it before Peter and John.
be saved and recovered: For though we are not thus disabled and afflicted in body, yet there are other maladies of a much more threatening nature, for the cure of which you and I, and all that hear me this day, must, as we value the very lives of our souls, apply to Jesus, and only to him.

13 Now when they of the council saw the boldness of Peter and John, and observed the freedom of speech with which they pleaded their Master's cause, and the high degree to which they extolled him, in the presence of those magistrates who had so lately condemned him to the most shameful death; and understood at the same time that they were illiterate men, and in private stations of life, they were greatly astonished. And upon farther recollection too they knew them, and remembered of those two disciples that they had been with Jesus, particularly the night that he was taken, and had attended him to the house of Caiaphas, where several now in court had been present at his examination. (Compare John xviii. 15, 16.) And they would gladly have done their utmost to confound a testimony which bore so hard upon themselves. But seeing the man that was cured, whom they knew to have been so long lame, now standing with them perfectly recovered, they had nothing to say against the fact, though they were most unwilling to own a doctrine which [it] tended so strongly to prove.

But

k In which we must be saved.] Dr. Whitby and some later writers have taken a great deal of pains to prove, that σωθήσεται here signifies healing, and have argued for it from the connection, and from many texts, especially in the Evangelists, where it plainly has that sense, as it has likewise, Acts xiv. 9, where it is translated to be healed. (See Matt. ix. 21, 22; Mark v. 23; Luke xvii. 19; and compare note 4 on Mark v. 28, Vol. I. p. 578.) But it is strange, that any should not have seen, that, if the most determinate word for healing had been here used, as ἄθεράζοντα, or ωρωντα, it must have signified spiritual and eternal salvation, since it is plain, that, when Peter says, εν χωρίς σωθησθαι, he takes it for granted, that all who heard him needed to apply to Christ for this healing. Now there is no reason to believe, they were all afflicted with bodily maladies, nor could he have any imaginable warrant to promise them all supernatural recovery in that case.—Raphelius in a remarkable note on this text, ed. (Ierod. p. 329—332,) endeavours among others things to prove, that ἄθεραζον, or the name of a person, was a manner of speaking used in reference to one regarded as God, and the Author of salvation.

l Illiterate men, and in private stations of life.] The original words ἄγνωστοι ἀπ' ἀλληλοῖς have literally this signification, that they were not scholars, nor in any public rank of life as the priests and magistrates were; but they import no want of natural good sense, or any ignorance of what was then the subject of debate: so that our translation seems very unhappy here.

1 They knew them that they had been with Jesus, particularly the night that he was taken, &c.] See note on Luke xxii. 57, p. 363.—Grotius justly observes also, that the rulers were often present when Christ taught publicly, and so might have seen Peter and John near him at other times, as well as on the occasion mentioned in the paraphrase.
The council are at a loss what to do with them.

But as they did not choose the apostles should perceive they knew not what to say; having ordered them to withdraw for a while out of the room where the council was sitting, they privately conferred among themselves, saying, 'What shall we do with these men? It would be neither reasonable nor safe to punish them now; for that indeed a very surprising and signal miracle hath been wrought by them, is clearly manifest to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and we ourselves cannot possibly deny [it.] Nevertheless on the other hand, it is equally plain, that both our credit and our interest require us, to suppress the rumour of it as much as we can; and therefore that it may not any farther spread among the people, and be a means of raising discontent, and perhaps of occasioning some dangerous insurrection among them, which may throw the city and nation into confusion, let us severely threaten them with the most rigorous punishment, in case they persist in such bold discourses as those we have now been hearing, that so they may not dare to preach as they have done, and from henceforth may speak no more to any man in this obnoxious name.

And the whole council having agreed to this as the most proper method they could at present take with the apostles, they called them in again, and telling them how much they were offended at the liberty they took, they charged them in a very strict and severe manner, that upon pain of their highest displeasure, and as they regarded their own safety, and even their lives, they should not presume on any account whatever to speak any more, or to teach the people in the name of Jesus, if they would not be looked upon as seditious persons, and be dealt with as incendiaries and rebels, as their master had been; whom they still asserted to have deserved the punishment that he had suffered.

But Peter and John felt themselves animated in this arduous circumstance with a courageous zeal.

[1] Nevertheless.] Instances in which signifies Nevertheless, are numerous in the New Testament; and it is often rendered so by our translators. See Mark xiv. 15; John xi. 15; Rom. v. 14; 2 Cor. xii. 16; Gal. iv. 30; 2 Tim. 1. 12; And many instances from profane writers are brought by Eliazer in his note here.

[2] They charged them that they should not speak any more—in the name of Jesus. The very thing, that men conscious of the truth of the apostle's testimony, and self-condemned, would do; attempting by violence to stop their mouths, as they knew they could not answer them any other way.

zeal, which would not permit them to be silent, lest that silence should be interpreted as a promise to quit their ministry, and therefore answering them with an undaunted freedom, they said before them all, Whether it be a fit or a righteous thing in the sight of God, to whom we are all accountable, to obey you rather than God, judge ye. You cannot but know in your own consciences on which side the superior obligation lies; and you must therefore expect, that we shall act accordingly. For though we respect you as our civil rulers, and are heartily willing to yield all subjection to you so far as we lawfully can, yet since God hath charged us with the publication of this important message, on which, as we have already testified, the eternal salvation of men depends, we dare not to be silent in a case of such importance, and are free to tell you that we cannot but speak the things which we have so often seen and heard, and which God hath so miraculously empowered us to declare, not only in this city, but throughout all the earth.

And though the apostles spake with such great freedom, the council were so confounded by the force of truth, that they did not think fit to proceed to any further extremities at that time; but having threatened them again in severer terms than before, they dismissed them; finding nothing done by them, for which they might with any show of reason punish them, and not daring to proceed in so arbitrary a manner as they would otherwise have done, because of the people, whose resentment they feared: For such was the impression that was made upon the people by the cure of the lame man, that they had all an high esteem and mighty veneration for the apostles, who were publicly known to be the instruments of working it, and all glorified God in raptures of astonishment for a Whether it be righteous—to obey you rather than God, judge ye. As they professed to believe the being and infinite perfections of God, they must, on their own principles, easily see the absurdity of expecting obedience to their commands from good men, who believed themselves divinely commissioned. There is a passage which bears some resemblance to this, in the Apology of Socrates as recorded by Plato, (op. p. 23,) which appears to me among the finest of antiquity. When they were condemning him to death for teaching the people, he said, O ye Athenians, I embrace and love you; but I will obey God rather than you; [πιστεύεις ἐν τῷ Θεῷ μακάρω ν ὑμῖν], and if you would displease me and spare my life, on condition that I should cease to teach my [fellow-citizens], I would rather die a thousand times than accept the proposal. What are ten thousand subtilities of the ancient philosophers, when compared with a sentiment like this!

For the man was above forty years old on whom this miracle of healing was shewed. for that which was done: And indeed they well might be affected with it, for the man on whom this miracle of healing was wrought, was more than forty years old: so that hardly any thing could have appeared to human judgment to be a more desperate case, than so inveterate and confirmed a lameness; and yet he was (as we have already related) in one moment completely cured by the word of the apostles and the power of their divine Master operating with it.

IMPROVEMENT.

We see, in the instance before us, the natural but detestable effects of a proud, bigotted, overbearing temper, even where it seems least excusable. The Sadducees themselves, though they believed no future state of retribution, yet persecuted the apostles as eagerly, as if they, like some other Jews, had expected to merit heaven by their severity to them. (Compare John xvi. 2.)

On the other side, it is delightful to observe the zeal and courage, with which Peter and John defended the cause of their crucified Redeemer, even in the presence of those by whom he had so lately been condemned. Thus can God give power to the feeble, and increase the strength of them that have no might. (Isa. xli. 29.) The testimony they bore is well worth our regarding. There is salvation in no other; neither is there any other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved, O that the ends of the earth might hear and reverence that name! O that thousands, to whom it is yet unknown, may learn to build all their hopes of salvation upon it; and may we never be ashamed to own it, never afraid to adhere to it! May we speak of it with such a savour, may we defend it with such a zeal, that they who are round about us may take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus, and trace the genuine effects of our intimate acquaintance with him!

Never was there an instance of a more memorable combat between the force of evidence and of prejudice; never a more impudent attempt to bear down the cause of unquestionable truth by brutal violence. But great is the truth, and it will prevail. May the ministers of the gospel never want that courage in the defence of it which these holy men expressed; always judging it infinitely more reasonable, more safe, and more necessary, to obey God than man! Never may we be ashamed to profess our reverence and love to him, who is our supreme ruler, and our most bountiful friend; and may he give us such an inward and heart-influencing sense of the worth and sweetness of his gospel, as may effectually prevent our betraying or neglecting it!
SECT. IX.

Peter and John return to their company, and having told them what had passed, they all unite in an inspired prayer, which is attended with a renewed effusion of the Spirit, in consequence of which they all preach the gospel with new vigour and wonderful success; the number of converts, and the sales of estates, are greatly increased. Acts IV. 23—35.

Acts IV. 23.

PETER and John being dismissed from their examination by the Sanhedrin, with a strict charge that they should preach no more in the name of Jesus, no sooner were they at liberty but they came to their own company, and related all that the chief priests and elders had said to them, and how severely they had threatened them.

And when they heard [it,] a divine inspiration came upon all that were present in an extraordinary manner, so that they immediately lifted up their voice with one accord to God in the following prayer, which upon this occasion was suggested by the Holy Spirit to every one in the assembly; and they said, O thou supreme Lord of universal nature, we humbly acknowledge thou art the God who didst make heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are in them: Who didst by thine Holy Spirit say by the mouth of thy servant David, (Psal. ii. 1, 2.) "Why did the heathen nations rage, and the people imagine vain things, forming projects which must certainly end in their own disappointment and ruin? Why did the kings of the earth enter into a confederacy to set themselves as it were in hostile array, and why were the rulers of it, forgetting their mutual differences, combined together in one association against the Lord, and against his Messiah, whom he hath anointed, that all their voices might join by immediate inspiration; which seems a circumstance graciously adapted for the encouragement of them all to suffer the greatest extremities in this cause, and answers the phrase here used much better, than if we were to suppose one only to have spoken, and the rest to have put their cordial union to it; which yet would be a much more tolerable account of the matter, than that which I first mentioned.

ed to be the great ruler of all." We, O God, have now seen the literal accomplishment of these words; for of a truth here has been a most audacious conspiracy in this city of Jerusalem, where we now are, against thee, and against thine holy child Jesus, whom thou hast so visibly anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power, to accomplish the glorious work of erecting thy kingdom among men; and both Herod the tetrarch, and Pontius Pilate the Roman governor, with the heathen, and the people of Israel, have combined in the impious attempt: But it is our unspeakable comfort to think, that by their utmost rage they cannot break in upon their schemes, or prevent the efficacy of any of thy purposes; for we know that in the midst of all this impious fury they have shewn against thy Son, they have only been able to do what thine hand had pointed out before, and what thy unerring counsel, to which all future events are obvious, had before determined, that for wise reasons thou wouldst permit to be done.

And as to what now remains to accomplish this important scheme of raising thy church on the sure foundation of his cross, we beseech thee, O Lord, to regard these their haughty threatenings, with which they are endeavouring to discourage the chosen witnesses of his resurrection; and to give unto these thy servants, and to all others that are to join their testimony, to speak thy word with all freedom and resolution, in the midst of the most violent opposition that can arise:

b [Have combined to do, &c.] Limborch (Theolog. lib. ii. cap. 59, § 17) contends strongly for a transposition of the words thus: "They have combined against thine Holy Child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed to do what thine hand and thy counsel had determined, &c." But this transposition is arbitrary; and it is so expressly said elsewhere by Luke, when he was entering on his sufferings, that the Son of man went as it was determined concerning him, (Luke xxii. 22.) and it so plainly appears in fact, that these circumstances were expressly determined or marked out in the prophecies of the Old Testament, that I see not what end the admission of such a transposition would answer. It is much more rational (as we observed in note i. on that text in Luke, p. 287,) to explain this determination in such a manner, as to make it consistent with the free agency of the persons concerned. When God's hand and his counsel are said to have determined these things, it may signify God's having pointed out this great event so wisely concerted in his eternal counsels, and marked beforehand as it were all the boundaries of it (as the word ἐπέτρεπες may well signify,) in the prophetic writings. This seems more natural, than to suppose, (as Bishop Pearson and Dr. Hammond do,) that it alludes to the designation of the Lord's goat on the day of expiation, which was by lifting up the lot on high, and then laying it on the head of the animal to be sacrificed. See Pears. on the Creed, p. 185, and Hammond in loc.

c Give unto thy servants to speak thy word with all freedom.] Etsler has shewn here, by some very happy quotations, that several of the Heathens acknowledged the [προφητεία] freedom of speech on great and pressing occasions, to be a divine gift. Compare Prov. xvi. 1.

d They
They sell their estates, and have all things in common.

sects. ix.

Arise: Especially whilst thou art animating them by the performance of such works of power and mercy, and art stretching out thine own almighty hand for healing the most incurable distemper; and while such astonishing signs and wonders as these are done by the name of thine holy child Jesus; which we hope thou wilt still continue to perform, however the rage of the enemy may be excited by them.

31 And while they were thus praying, God was pleased miraculously to declare his gracious acceptance of their petitions: for the place in which they were assembled was shaken, as the upper room had been on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. 2.) and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit; and being animated by that strong impulse, which through his operation they felt upon their hearts, they spake the word of God wherever they came with all courageous freedom, and renewed their public testimony without any appearance of fear, on the very day on which they had been so solemnly forbidden by the Sanhedrim to preach any more in the name of Jesus.

32 And that sacred agent wrought upon their souls not only as the spirit of zeal and courage, but of love, so that the very heart and soul of the whole multitude of believers, numerous as they were, was all one: Nor did any one [of them] call any of his possessions his own; but all things were common amongst them, and each was as welcome to participate of them as the original proprietor could be, being in these new bonds of Christian fellowship as dear to him as himself. And with great power, that is, with a divine force of eloquence and of miracles, did the apostles give forth their important testimony of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus; and great grace was upon them all, so that the energy and sweetness of the gospel was felt by the inward experience both of speakers and hearers, beyond what it was possible for words to express.

Neither

30 By stretching forth thine hand to heal, and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy Holy Child Jesus.

31 And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with boldness.

32 And the multitude of them that believed, were of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them, that ought of the things which he possessed, was his own, but they had all things common.

33 And with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: and great grace was upon them all.

4 They were all filled with the Holy Spirit.] I will not assert, that eleven tongues fell upon them again; but I think it probable, with Dr. Benson, that some visible symbol of the Spirit's descent might now be given.

e All things were common amongst them.] See note i on chap. ii. 44. p. 524. To have one heart and soul is a proverbial expression for the most intimate and endearing friendship as Fisner and others have shewn.

6 Great grace was upon them all.] Casaubon, Grotius, and some others, understand this of the favor they had among the people on account of their charity and good conduct. But this is by no means the natural import of this phrase, which is very different from that used, Acts ii. 47. Sect. viii. p. 525.
Neither was there any one indigent person among them, though many of them were far from their habitations, and many others in low circumstances of life: for as many as were proprietors of lands or houses, sold them as fast as they could find any to purchase them, and brought the price of the things they had sold, whether it were more or less. And laid [it] down at 35 the feet of the apostles, to be disposed of as they should direct; who discharged their trust with the strictest fidelity; and took care that distribution was made to every one according as any had need for his present relief: (Compare chap. ii. 45;) The apostles esteeming themselves sufficiently happy, while living in the same plain manner with their brethren, in the opportunity which the divine goodness gave them of being so helpful to others both in temporals and spirituals.

IMPROVEMENT.

This was indeed the golden age of the church; and it is impossible to trace the memoirs of it, if we love Sion, without a secret Ver. complacency and exultation of mind. How amiable and how venerable do the apostles and primitive converts appear, in this native simplicity of the Christian character! and what a glory did the grace and Spirit of God put upon them, far beyond all that human establishments, splendid dignities, or ample revenues, could ever give to those that have succeeded them! While the multitude of them had one heart and one soul, and each was ready to impart to his brethren whatever he himself possessed, how high a relish of pleasure did they receive, and how were their joys multiplied by each of their number!

Thus does divine grace, when it powerfully enters into the heart open it in sentiments of generosity and love. Thus does it conquer that selfish temper which reigns so frequently in the minds of sinful men, and makes them like wild beasts, rather than like brethren to each other. Providence does not indeed call us entirely to give up our possessions, or to introduce a community of goods among Christians, in circumstances so different from those which we have now been surveying. Yet surely it is always our duty, and will be our highest interest, to remember that we are not original proprietors of what we possess, but stewards, who are to manage what is intrusted to our care, for the honour of our great Master, and the good of his family here on earth; continually ready to resign any part or even the whole it, whenever these important ends shall require such a resignation.
In the mean time, let us frequently lift up our hearts, to the great and ever blessed God, who hath made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all that is in them, that he would support and extend the progress of that gospel in the world, which he hath so graciously begun to plant. Kings may still set themselves, and rulers take counsel against it; but he knows how to turn their counsels into foolishness, and their rage into shame. He hath anointed Jesus his holy child with the oil of gladness, and placed him on his throne in heaven; and all the united malice and fury of his enemies can do no more, than what shall make part of his wise and gracious scheme for the government of his people. Let us pray, that he would give freedom of speech to all employed in pleading his cause; and that he will plentifully anoint them with the effusion of his Spirit: And let the signs and wonders which were done by the name of Jesus in former ages, encourage us to hope that he will never totally desert a scheme which he once so illustriously interposed to establish; and consequently let them animate us to exert ourselves in his service, whatever labours, threatenings, or dangers may meet us in our way!

SECT. X.

The sale of estates proceeding, Ananias and Sapphira attempt fraudulently to impose upon the apostles, and are immediately struck dead. That event, together with other extraordinary miracles wrought about the same time, promotes the increase of the church more and more. Acts IV. 36, to the end. V. 1—16.

Acts IV. 36.

Among the rest of those primitive converts who so generously contributed of their substance for the relief and subsistence of the poor believers in so extraordinary a circumstance, there was one Joses, who, on account of his great benevolence and usefulness, was much respected in the church, and by the apostles was surnamed Barnabas, which being interpreted from the Syriac language, signifies a son of consolation. He was a Levite, who was so far

Jos. surnamed Barnabas—a son of consolation.] Considering how common the names of Joses and Joseph were, there seems no just reason to conclude, as some have done, that this was the Joseph mentioned chap. i. 23, as a candidate for the office of an apostle. (Comp. note 1 p. 303, on that text.)—Nor can I see any reason to conclude with Abp. Wake, (Apost. Fa-thers, Intro. p. 62.) that this Joses was called a son of consolation, to express the great consolation the brethren received from the sale of his estate. The name seems rather to refer to his extraordinary abilities for the ministerial work, and to those gifts of the Spirit, whereby he was enabled both to comfort, and to exhort, as the word also signifies.—Mr. Fleming makes.
Ananias sells his, and keeps back part of the price.

57 Having land, sold it, and brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet.

Acts V. 1. But a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession,

2 And kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it, and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostles' feet.

3 But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land?

makes it a most honourable title indeed, as signifying, a son of the operation of the Paraclet, that is, of the Holy Ghost.

b An estate, which was capable of being alienated, &c.] He could not have sold that which was his paternal inheritance as a Levite: But this might perhaps be some legacy or purchase of land in Judea, to which he might have a title till the next Jubilee, or perhaps some land in Cyprus: and we may suppose it mentioned, either as the first foreign estate sold, or as of some extraordinary value.

c Laid it down at the feet of the apostles.] Orobio insinuates, opus Limborch, Colat. p. 134 (and it is one of the weakest and meanest things I remember in his writings) that it was no small advantage to poor fisermen to be treasurers of so considerable a bank. But nothing can be more unjust and unnatural, than to suspect, that men, who were so ready to sacrifice their lives to the cause of truth and the happiness of mankind, should be capable of falsifying such a trust as this, for the sake of a little money. Their miraculous powers were joined with a thousand marks of probity in their daily conduct to warrant such a confidence, which was but a natural token of due respect. We see in chap. vi.

2, 3, 4, how ready they were soon to transfer the management of this affair to other hands; and the following story furnishes us with an additional answer to this cavil, which is beyond all exception.
4 Whilst it remained unsold, did it not continue thine, notwithstanding thy profession of faith in Jesus? And when it was sold, was it not still in thine own power? to have given or not given the whole, or any part of it, into the treasury of the church, as thou shouldst think proper? Why then hast thou admitted this thing into thine heart, so meanly and so profanely to dissemble on this solemn occasion? Thou hast not lived up to men alone, to us, or to the church, whose treasurers we are; but hast lied to the blessed God himself, who residing in us by his divine Spirit, is determined to make thee a terrible example of his displeasure for an affront so directly levelled at himself, in the midst of this astonishing train of his extraordinary operations.

5 And Ananias hearing these words, while the sound of them was yet in his ears, fell down and expired; that by his sad example all might learn...
learn how dangerous it was to affront that divine Spirit under whose influence the apostles acted: And it answered its end, for great fear came not only on the immediate spectators, but on all that heard the report of these things. Then some of the young and able-bodied men in the assembly arose, and perceiving there was no room to hope for the recovery of one who was struck dead by such an immediate act of the divine power, they bound him up in his mantle, without any farther circumstance of mourning or delay, and carrying him out, they buried him.

And after the interval of about three hours his wife Sapphira also, who was absent when this happened, not knowing what was done, came in. And Peter answered unto her, Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much. And she said, Yea, for so much.

Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out.

Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost: and the young men came in, and found her dead, and carrying her forth buried her by her husband. under his miraculous influence and direction. See Cradock's Apos. Hist. p. 27, and Reynolds's Lett. to a Deist. p. 245.

She also fell down—and expired.] To what is said before in vindication of this seeming severity, in note 4, we may add, that such exemplary punishment, of so heinous a crime was the more expedient, as Christianity was now in its first rise. So, just at the opening of the Mosaic institution, Nadab and Abihu were struck dead with lightning for a fault (as it seems) of much less aggravated guilt: (Lev. x. 1, 2.) and the wisest human governments agree, y set on the like principle.
And great fear came upon all the assembly, who were eye-witnesses of what had passed, and upon all others that heard the report, which was soon spread abroad of these things; who could not but acknowledge, that it was the immediate hand of God by which they both died, and that he was just in this awful dispensation.

And many other stupendous signs and wonders were done among the people in the most public manner, by the hands of the apostles: And they continued in the strictest fellowship, and union with the whole company of believers, and were frequently all unanimously together in that spacious building, which we have already mentioned by the name of Solomon's portico, conversing together with the most affectionate expressions of mutual endearment. And none of the rest who were not really converted to Christianity, presumed to join himself to them, as some mean spirited creatures might possibly otherwise have done for a while, in a low view of some transient advantage, by a share in the distributions that were made. But all the people had a mighty veneration for the apostles, and magnified them with the highest expressions of reverence and respect, as persons who were owned by God in the most signal manner: And though the death of these two unhappy offenders terrified many from hypocritically joining their company, yet the success of the gospel was promoted, rather than hindered by it, so that great multitudes both of men and women, believing their testimony, were so much the more willingly added in a solemn manner to the church of the Lord, and made an open profession of their faith; wisely inferring from what had happened, how dangerous

11 And great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things.

12 And by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people; (and they were all with one accord in Solomon's porch.)

13 And of the rest durst no man join himself to them: but the people magnified them.

14 And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women.)

[None of the rest presumed to join himself to them.] Dr. Lightfoot explains this of the rest of the hundred and twenty, that they durst not join to the twelve, or equal themselves to the apostles in office or dignity: (Lightfoot, Comment in loc.) But as there is no mention of that number in this chapter, so (as Dr. Whitby observes,) they never joined themselves before to the apostles in this sense; nor is this any where the meaning of the word κοινώνεται, which signifies to associate, or unite with, to adhere or cleave to any. (Compare Acts ix. 26. x. 28. xvii. 34.)—Beza would have it, that κοινώνεται signifies here to attack or touch, and that κοινώνεται, the rest, refers to their powerful enemies as distinguished from the people: But that significations of κοινώνεται is, as he acknowledges, very unusual, and is here quite unnecessary. —L'Enfant thinks the meaning is, that persons of distinction had not the resolution to join them, whatever inward conviction they might have as to the truth of their doctrine. But after all, it is most natural to understand it, as if it had been said, "The people held them in distant admiration, and presumed not on any false pretence to join them, if not truly converted to their religion;" which yet (as it appears by the next verse,) many were, who readily came into a full and solemn profession of it, as indeed the late miracle was a glorious, though dreadful, demonstration of its truth.
Reflections on the case of Ananias and Sapphira.

15 Insomuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that at the least the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them, dangerous it would be to oppose or suppress the inward convictions of their minds, in a matter of so great importance.

And they were farther animated to boldness in their profession, by the many gracious miracles which succeeded to this work of terror; insomuch that all along the most public streets they brought out the sick, and laid them at their doors on beds and couches, when they were not able to walk; that at least the shadow of Peter as he was coming by, might overshadow some or other of them: And this extraordinary faith was rewarded by the healing of many in that circumstance.

And as the fame of these wonderful works spread abroad, multitudes also [out] of the cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits; and they were healed every one.

16 There came also a multitude out of the cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits; and they were healed every one.

IMPROVEMENT.

Let us behold, with humble reverence, this awful instance of Ver. the divine severity, so well calculated to impress the minds of these new converts, and to prevent any of those frauds, which the charity of those who were most zealous in their profession might have occasioned in some others. Let us learn, how hateful false-hood is to the God of truth and make it our care to avoid it; and not only shun a direct lye, but the taking undue advantage from any ambiguities of expression, and, in a word, all recourse to the arts of equivocation. God only knows, how soon such treacherous lips may be sealed up in eternal silence.

How does Satan delude the heart which he fills! And how peculiarly fatal is the delusion, when he leads men to sins, which especially affront the Spirit of God! That Spirit rested on the apostles, and taught them to discover the hidden things of darkness; so that they who tempted it, fell in the attempt, and became a sign. May integrity and uprightness ever preserve us! (Psal. xxv. 21.) And, while we avoid all the kinds and arts of dissimulation, let us peculiarly detest those, which would offer a double insult to the
The God of heaven, by taking their dress from the religion, which his own Son has planted.

Ver. The church is never happier than when the sons of falsehood are deterred from intruding in it. If its members are less numerous, it is a sufficient balance, that it is more pure. We see what singular miracles were done by the apostles; miracles equal, and in some respects, as it seems by these instances, superior to those which Christ performed in the days of his ministration here below. When will the happy time come, in which men shall express as great a concern for their souls, as they here did for their bodies? When shall the streets and assemblies be filled with those who, from a sense of their spiritual maladies, shall apply to the ministers of Christ for healing? Let it always be remembered, that whatever they do for this happy purpose, it is indeed their master that does it by them; and that all their most assiduous applications, separate from his blessing, can effect no more than the shadow of Peter could have done, if the power of Christ had not wrought on those over whom it passed.

SECT. XI.

The apostles continuing to preach to the people, are apprehended and imprisoned, and, after a miraculous deliverance, are brought before the Sanhedrim the next day, and scourged; Gamaliel's advice prevailing, to prevent any farther extremities. Acts v. 17, to the end.

SECT. XI.

Acts v. 17.

IT was observed in the preceding section, what extraordinary miracles were done by the apostles in the name of Jesus, whom still, notwithstanding all the menaces of their rulers, they continued faithfully to preach, and to assure the people of his resurrection from the dead, and of eternal life to be obtained through him: But this, as it might reasonably be expected, drew another storm upon them: For the high priest arising as it were with awakened and renewed fury, and all they that were with him which was the sect of the Sadducees, who were a The sect of the Sadducees.] There is no sufficient reason from this text to conclude with Grotius, that the high-priests and his kindred were Sadducees, though it is probable they might be so, as Josephus affirms that some of the high-priests were of this sect, and particularly Ananus, one of the sons of that Anna, who was father-in-law to Caiaphas. (See Mr. Biscoe, at Boyle's Lect. chap. v. § 4, p. 110, 111.) The Sadducees however would be most ready to exert themselves in persecuting the apostles, as they were most exasperated by their doctrine, which was directly opposite to the notions they maintained. See the paraphrase on Acts iv. 2, sect. 8, p. 537.

were especially devoted to his interest, and most offended at the doctrine of the resurrection, were filled with zeal and indignation against these men, who, as their enemies affected to represent it, made so dangerous an attack both on their religious and political establishment:
And in support of these unjust charges, they were determined to bring them to another trial before the Sanhedrim, and for that purpose laid their hands on the apostles, and put them into the common prison, where the vilest of malefactors were lodged.

But that God might evidently shew, how impotent all their rage was against those whom he determined to support, and that they might be emboldened with a becoming confidence to bear their testimony in the midst of opposition and dangers, an angel of the Lord was sent to them, who, appearing in the midst of them by night, opened the doors of the prison, and without giving any alarm to the keepers, or any of the other prisoners, bringing them out of that place of confinement, said, as God hath thus miracuously interposed for your deliverance, neither flee, nor fear; but go, as soon as the gates are opened, and presenting yourselves boldly in the temple, as you did before you were seized, (whatever disagreeable the doctrine that you preach may be to those who believe nothing of a future state,) speak to the people assembled there at the hour of morning sacrifice all the words of this glorious gospel with which you are charged, on which the eternal life of men so evidently depends, and by which alone their final happiness can be secured.

And the apostles hearing [this] divine command, made no scruple immediately to obey it, and were so far from being discouraged by the fear of persecution, that with an earnest zeal to carry on the work they were engaged in, they went very early into the temple, and taught the people with the same freedom as before, who assembled there to pay their morning ado-rations unto God.

But

b Into the common prison.] That this was as the paraphrase expresses it, the place where the vilest malefactors were lodged, cannot be doubted. But it is not certain,
The council are surprized not to find them in prison.

But in the mean time, the high-priest being come, and they that were with him, into the room where the council was usually held, they called together all the members of the Sanhedrim, even (as we have hinted several times before, that the name signifies,) the whole senate of the children of Israel, being solicitous that there might be as full a house as possible on so important an occasion: And when they were convened, they sent proper officers to the common prison to take charge of the apostles, and to have them brought into their presence, that the court might proceed to their examination and punishment. But when the officers came thither, to their great surprise they found them not in the prison; and yet could not discover what way they had took to make their escape, considering the circumstances that appeared on inquiry. Returning therefore to the council, they made their report, saying, We found indeed the prison shut with all possible safety, and the keepers standing without as sentinels before the doors; but having opened [them,] and gone into the place in which the prisoners had been put, and where we did not doubt but we should find them, to our great astonishment we found no one within of those whom we sought.

Now when the high-priest and the captain of the temple, and the other chief-priests who were gathered together, heard these words, they doubted concerning them, and knew not what to think of it how this could be; that is, whether they had procured their liberty by corrupting the keepers, or whether there might not be something miraculous in the deliverance of persons whom such extraordinary circumstances had attended. But one, who knew their disappointment and the uneasiness it gave them, came into the court, and told them, saying, Behold, the men whom ye put yesterday in prison, are now standing in the temple, however they came thither, and are teaching the people assembled there with as much freedom and confidence as ever; which indeed does not look like a clandestine escape, which could only have been made with a view of flight and concealment.

Then the captain of the temple went with the officers by the direction of the Sanhedrim, and having found the apostles in the temple, brought them away, but not by violence, for they feared the —But the high-priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the senate of the children of Israel, and sent to the prison to have them brought.

22 But when the officers came, and found them not in the prison, they returned and told,

23 Saying, The prison truly found we shut with all safety; and the keepers standing without the doors: but when we had opened, we found no man within.

24 Now when the high-priest, and the captain of the temple, and the chief-priests heard these things, they doubted of them whereto this would grow.

25 Then came one and told them, saying; Behold, the men whom ye put in prison, are standing in the temple, and teaching the people.

26 Then went the captain with the officers, and brought them without violence: (for they
They are taken again, and brought before the Sanhedrim.

27 And when they had brought them, they set them before the council: And the high priest asked them,

28 Saying, Did not we strictly command you, that you should not teach in this name? And behold ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us.

29 Then Peter and the other apostles answered and said, We ought to obey God rather than men.

They feared the people, lest they should have been stoned.)

the people, lest if they had offered any violence in their presence, it might have so provoked them that they should be stoned: For the people were so fully persuaded of a divine power engaged with the apostles, that they held their persons sacred, and would not have borne any open attack upon them: The apostles, on the other hand, were ready cheerfully to obey the summons, that they might repeat their testimony to their divine Master. And accordingly the captain and those that attended him, when they had brought them to the place where the council was sitting, made a report of what they had done, and set them before the Sanhedrin. And as soon as they appeared, the high-priest, singling out Peter and John, who had so lately been examined before them, asked them, Saying, Did we not strictly charge you two in particular but a very little while ago, and so in effect all the rest of your company, that you should not, on pain of our highest displeasure and the utmost rigour of the law, teach any more in this name of Jesus of Nazareth? And behold, instead of regarding our admonitions, or shewing any sense of the great lenity with which the court then treated you, you have been more busy and more daring than before in your seditious practices, so that you have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine; and it all centers in this, that you would bring the odium of this man's blood upon us, and would incense the populace against us, as if he were an innocent person whom we had murdered: So that it is no thanks to you, if we are not stoned, or torn in pieces by them, for that act of necessary justice, for such it was, which we were obliged to do upon him.

But Peter and [the rest of] the apostles, who were now all before them, answered and said, O ye senate of Israel, ye cannot but in your own consciences know, as we plainly declared before this assembly when we received the charge now referred to, (chap. iv. 19.) that it is absolutely the proper fit temporal deliverance by their means, (compare Acts i. 6.) of which they were to exceeding fond, and a disappointment in their hope of which had turned their ho fit and necessary to obey the almighty and ever blessed God, rather than men, be they ever so great and powerful. We assuredly know, and we testify to you as we have been testifying it to the people, that the God of our fathers hath raised up Jesus his son, whom ye slew in the most infamous manner that ye could invent, hanging him crucified on a tree, as if he had been the meanest of slaves and the vilest of malefactors.

31 But this very person, notwithstanding all the outrage with which you treated him, hath God exalted at his own right hand [to be] a Prince and Saviour to his people, to give repentance, or to send terms of peace and reconciliation by him, even unto Israel, by whom he hath been so ungratefully insulted and abused, and to bestow on those that shall repent, the free and full remission of all their aggravated sins.

32 And we are appointed his witnesses of these things, how incredible soever they may appear to you; and so is the Holy Spirit also, whom God hath given not only to us the apostles, but also to many others of them who submit themselves to his government, most evidently attesting the same, and proving how absolutely necessary it is for every one, great and small, to lay aside prejudice and opposition, and with humble penitence to believe in Jesus.

33 And the high-priest and the Sadducees, when they heard [this] courageous testimony and faithful remonstrance, were enraged beyond all measures of patience and of decency, so that they even grinded their teeth at them, like savage beasts that could gladly have devoured them; and with hearts full of rancour they immediately

30 The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree.

31 Him hath God exalted with his right hand, to be a prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins.

32 And we are his witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him.

33 When they heard that, they were cut to the heart, and took mony arising from this miraculous communication of the Spirit to Christians at that time, entirely removes the objection from Christ's not appearing in public after his resurrection: for, had there been any imposition, it had been easier of the two to have persuaded people at a distance, that he had so appeared to the Jewish rulers, or even to the multitude, and yet had been rejected, than that he had given his servants such extraordinary powers; since, had this assertion been false, every one might have been a witness to the falsehood of such a pretence, without the trouble and expense of a journey to Jerusalem, or any other distant place.

34 Then stood there up one in the council, a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of law, had in reputation among all the people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space, 35 And said unto them, Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves, what ye intend to do, as touching these men.

36 For before these days rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be some body, to whom

1 Gamaliel.] This was the elder of that name, a man of so great honour among them, that Onkelos, the author of the Targum, is said to have burnt seventy pound weight of perfumes at his funeral: Nay it is said, the honour of the law failed with him. If he were really, as he is reported to have been, the author of those Prayers against Christians, so long used in the Jewish synagogues, he must have lost that moderation of temper which he manifested here; perhaps exasperated at the growth of the new sect; and the testimony so boldly borne by the apostles. He was Paul’s master; (Acts xxii. 3.) and no doubt he informed that headstrong youth (for such he then was) of what now passed, and of many other things, which rendered his sin in persecuting the Christians so much the more aggravated. See Wits. Melaneum. cap. 1, § 13, p. 19, 13; and Mr. Biscoe, at Boyle’s Lect. chap. iii. § 9, p. 77, 78.

6 One Theudas arose.] As the Theudas mentioned by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 5, [al. 2.] § 1,) under the character of a false prophet, (who drew a great number of people after him, with a promise of dividing Jordan before them, but was defeated and beheaded, most of his followers being also slain and imprisoned,) appeared when Padius was procurator of Judea, that is, according to Capellus seven, or according to Dr. Whitby at least ten years after this was spoken, there can be no reference to him here. I am therefore ready to conclude with Dr. Lightfoot and Basnage, (whose opinion Mr. Lardner has so learnedly defended) that among the many leaders, who, as Josephus assures us, (Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 10, [al. 11.] § 4—8,) took up arms in the defence of the public liberties, when the grand enrolment and taxation were made by Cyrenius in the days of Archelaus, (see note b on Luke ii, 2. Vol. I. p. 62) there was one called Theudas, which (as Grotius observes,) was a very common name among the Jews.—He seems to have been supported by smaller numbers than the second of the name, and (as the second afterwards did,) perished in the attempt; but, as his followers were dispersed, and not slaughtered, like those of the second Theudas, survivors might talk much of him, and Gamaliel might have been...
Gamaliel cites some former cases to appease their rage.

extraordinary person to whom a number of men, amounting to about four hundred, adhered; who, notwithstanding this, was himself quickly slain by the Roman forces, and all who hearkened to him were scattered, and after all the boasting promises of their leader, came to nothing. After him Judas the Galilean arose, in the days of the late enrolment, and endeavouring on the principles of sacred liberty to dissuade the Jew from owning the authority of the Romans in that instance, he drew a multitude of people after him; and the consequence was, that he also himself was quickly destroyed, and all who had hearkened to him were dispersed. And therefore with regard to the present affair I say unto you, and give it as my most serious and deliberate advice now in the present crisis, refrain from these men, and let them alone to go on as they can, neither siding with them, nor violently opposing them; for if this counsel which they are taking, or this work which they have performed, be of men, if it be merely a human contrivance and deceit, which we are not capable of proving that it is, been particularly informed of his history, though Josephus only mentions it in general. Mr. Lardner, in his judicious remarks on this subject, has shewn, that there were many persons of the same name, whose histories greatly resembled each other. See Lardner's Cred. of Gosp. Hist. Part I. Book ii. chap. 7.

After him] Bos has taken great pains in his note on this text, (Excurs. Sacr. p. 75—78,) to show, that μηλα τωι may signify besides him, and even before him in this connection with παρ' αλλων τωι μεστος, which he would render of late days. (Compare Acts xxii. 38.) This he observes in favour of his interpretation of ver. 56, which he supposes to refer to the Theudas of Josephus, whose insurrection he thinks must have happened before this speech of Gamaliel. But, as Beza and many others have abundantly proved, that this would quite overturn the chronology either of St. Luke or of Josephus, I conclude, that the very indeterminate expression παρ' αλλων μεστος in the preceding verse is most safely rendered some time ago, which, especially in an assembly of aged men, (as no doubt many of this council were,) might well be used in reference to an affair, which though it happened more than twenty years before, must be fresh in most of their memories. (See Mr. Lardner's Credibility, Part I. Book ii. ch. 7.) And, as Judas might arise after Theudas, though the same cardinal might (as is supposed in the preceding note,) occasion the insurrection of both, I see no need of departing from the usual rendering of the preposition μεστος in this construction, which every body knows is generally used to signify after—To connect μηλα τωι with the preceding verse, (as some propose,) is quite unnatural in grammar, as well as disagreeable to fact.

Judas the Galilean arose.] Josephus's account of this Judas Gaulonites, as he is generally called, may be seen in the beginning of the xviiith Book of his Antiquities.

All who had hearkened to him were dispersed.] Mr. Lardner justly observes, this does not imply they were destroyed, and imagines, that though Gamaliel would not directly assert it, yet he insinuates, (agreeably to his principles, as a Pharisee,) that perhaps Judas the Galilean, as well as the apostles, might be actuated by some divine impulse, and that in one instance, as well as the other, the doctrine might survive, when the teachers were taken off. See Lardner's Credibility, Part I. Book ii. chap. 1, § 5; But the argument will be good on the common interpretation; and as the word here used διεστρακωσαν, especially in this connection, most naturally implies calamities and disappointing dispersion, I apprehend, that, had it been intended in the sense my learned and much esteemed friend supposes, the present tense would rather have been used.
of men, it will come to nought:

39 But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God.

And to him they agreed: And when they had called the apostles, and beaten them, they commanded that they should not speak in the name of Jesus, and let them go.

40 And the council were unable to elude the force of what Gamaliel said, they yielded to him, acknowledging that his advice was safe and wise: And having called in the apostles, and ordered them to be scourged and beaten with rods in their presence, that in some measure they might vent their indignation, and might expose them to disgrace and shame, they strictly charged them as they had done before, (chap. iv. 18.) not to speak any more in the name of Jesus, if they would not incur yet severer punishment; and, having threatened them with what they must expect, if ever they were brought before them for the same crime again, they dismissed them for that time.

Thus were the apostles sent away, and, far from being terrified by all the cruel usage they had met with, or by the threatenings of their adversaries, they departed from the presence of the Sanhedrim, rejoicing that they were so honoured in the course of divine Providence, as to be counted worthy to suffer for Christ, and to be exposed to infamy for the sake of his venerable and sacred name, rightly judging, that a punishment of this kind, though generally shameful, became a glory to them, when borne in so excellent a cause, and for the sake of him, who, though so divinely great and so perfectly happy, had submitted not only to stripes, but to death for them. Instead therefore of obeying the order of
of the rulers, they grew so much the more courageous and diligent in spreading the gospel. And every day, from morning to night, they ceased not to pursue this great work; but took all opportunities to preach in the temple, though within sight of the Sanhedrin, and among many of its chief members, who, being obliged by their office often to resort thither, must frequently see and hear them; and at other times, between the seasons of public worship, they were engaged privately from house to house; and on the whole, one way or another, it was their constant business to teach and to preach Jesus as the Messiah, and to proclaim with unspeakable pleasure the good news of life and salvation given to sinners by him: The Sanhedrin, in the mean time, by the special providence of God, suffering them to go on, and affecting to overlook them as beneath their notice, though still with a secret rancour, which at length broke out into the extremest violence.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. Which shall we survey with the greater surprise, the continued courage of the apostles, or the continued malice of their persecutors? Again they seize them, again they imprison them; but how vainly do these feeble worms, amidst all the pride of dignity and power, oppose the counsels of Omnipotence?

19 The angel of the Lord opens the door of their prison, and leads forth his faithful servants to renewed liberty; an office which this celestial Spirit could not but perform with delight; as it was, no doubt, with unutterable pleasure that he gave them their errand, to go and publish with undaunted freedom and zeal the words of this life, of this gospel which enlivens dead souls, and points out the road to an happy immortality. O that the folly of those who have heard it had never converted it into a savour of death!

21—26 Yet, behold, the council renewed the attack! The same madness which instigated the Jews to seize Jesus, when they had been struck to the ground by his miraculous power, (John xviii. 6.) animated these wretches to contrive the destruction of persons whom God himself had just before rescued from their hands; as they had formerly plotted that of Lazarus, (John xii. 10.) who had by a yet more astonishing wonder been recalled from the grave. To what fatal extravagancies will not prejudice hurry the mind? Against what convincing evidence will it not harden it?

29 Ye shall, says our Lord, be brought before councils for my sake; and and it shall be for a testimony against them. (Matt. x. 18.) And such was this repeated admonition which these holy prisoners then at the bar gave to the judges of Israel: Still they urge the divine authority of their mission; still they proclaim him as head of the church and world, whom these very men had so lately crucified in so outrageous and contemptuous a manner. They point to him, whom these priests and rulers had insulted on the cross, as now exalted at the right hand of God, and urge them to seek repentance and remission of sin, from him, to whom they had denied the common justice due to the meanest of men, the common humanity due to the vilest of criminals in their dying moments, giving him in the thirst of his last agonies vinegar mingled with gall. (Mat. xxvii. 34.)

Thousands of the people had fallen under this charge; and Jesus the Prince had taken them under his protection. Jesus the Saviour had washed them in his blood. But by what is too frequently the fatal prerogative of greatness, these princes of Israel had hearts too high for the discipline of wisdom, and were engaged against these humble ministers of the Son of God; who nevertheless addressed them with all the respect which fidelity would allow, and could gladly have poured forth their blood for the salvation of those who so cruelly thirsted for it. They gnashed on these faithful ambassadors with their teeth, as if they would have devoured them alive; and justly will gnashing of teeth be the eternal portion of those who thus outrageously rejected the counsel of God against themselves. (Luke vii. 30.)

But God raised up a guardian for the apostles, where perhaps they least expected it; and the prudence of Gamaliel for a while checked the fury of his brethren: So does God sometimes use the natural good sense and temper of those who do not themselves receive the gospel, for the protection of those who are faithfully devoted to its service. Gamaliel had attentively observed former events; which is indeed the way to learn the surest lessons of wisdom, which are to be learnt any where but from the word of God. He had seen some ruined by their seditious zeal: and let those who call themselves Christians take heed; how they rashly rise up against legal authority, lest taking the sword they perish by it. (Mat. xxvi. 52.) Judiciously does he admonish the council to take heed lest they be found fighters against God. May divine grace ever guard us from that fatal error into which all who oppose the gospel, whatever they may imagine, assuredly fall! They cannot indeed dissolve it, but they dash themselves in pieces against it. Be wise therefore ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth! (Psal. ii. 10.)

For reasons of State, the apostles were to be scourged, though their judges were inwardly convinced that it was at least possible their message might be divine. Deliver us, O Lord, from that policy which shall lead us to imagine any evil so great as that which may offend thee! The punishment which these excellent men suffered was infamous, but the cause in which they endured it rendered it glorious; nor could those stripes be half so painful to their flesh, as an opportunity of thus approving their fidelity to their Lord was delightful to their pious souls: Well might they triumph in bearing the scourge for him who bore the cross, and died on it for them. Let us arm ourselves with the same mind, if in a severer sense than this we should be called for his sake to resist unto blood.

SECT. XII.

The choice of the seven deacons. Stephen preaches Christ, and after disputing with some of the Jewish societies, is brought before the Sanhedrim. Acts VI. 1—12.
The apostles propose, that some be chose for this service.

daily ministration of the charities that were distributed to the poor members of the church. And as the apostles were concerned, though not alone, in that distribution, the money raised as above by the sale of estates having been brought to them,) they were solicitous to obviate all those reflections which might fall upon them on this occasion, as they might otherwise in some measure have affected their usefulness.

And the twelve apostles having called the multitude of the disciples together, communicated the matter to them, and said, It is by no means proper or agreeable, that we, who have an office to discharge of so much greater weight and consequence, should leave the important care of dispensing the word of God, to attend the tables of the poor, and see who are served there; and yet this we must do, in order to prevent these complaints, unless some further measures be taken by common consent. Therefore, brethren, as you easily see how inconvenient it would be to suffer this care to lie upon us, and how inevitably it would render us incapable of attending to the proper duties of our office, it is our united request to you, that you look out from among yourselves seven men of an attested character, full of the Holy Spirit, and of approved wisdom, whom we may by common consent and approbation set over this affair, and who may make it their particular business to their pretensions, these strangers would (cautis puribus) be least capable of giving satisfaction.

c Having called the multitude of the disciples together.] Dr. Whitby has solidity proved on this head, that by these we are to understand, not (as Dr. Lightfoot imagined,) the rest of the hundred and twenty, but the whole body of Christian converts, they being the persons to whom satisfaction was then due.

d Seven men.] Mr. Mede thinks this an allusion to the seven archangels, whom he supposes the great courtiers of heaven; and many other texts, produced in support of that rabbinical opinion, seem almost as little to the purpose as this.

e Whom we may set over this affair.] I apprehend, the apostles speak here of what was to be the joint act of themselves and the whole church, as to be sure, after they had exercised the trust for a while, it would have been most indecent to have devolved it on any, but such as they should have approved.—It is a maxim with me in this work, to meddle as little as possible with controversies about church order and government, or any other circumstantial points that have unhappily divided the Protestant world. Yet I hope I shall give no offence by observing, that no just argument can be drawn from the actions of the apostles, with their extraordinary powers and credentials to the rights of succeeding ministers destitute of such powers and credentials. It would however have been happy for the church in every age, had its ordinary ministers taken the same care to act in concert with the people committed to their charge, and to pay all due deference to their natural rights, which the apostles themselves, extraordinary as their commission and office was, did on this and other occasions. The three grand canons, that all things should be done decently, in charity, and to edification, duly attended to, would supersede the necessity of ten thousand which have been made since, and perhaps, if rightly weighed, would be found absolutely to vacate a great part of them.

Seven deacons are chose and ordained.

4 And we in the mean time, being freed from this great incumbrance, will constantly attend to prayer, and to the ministry of the word, which is our grand business, and which we could be glad to prosecute without interruption.

5 And the speech the apostles made was pleasing to all the multitude, who were called together upon this occasion; and having deliberated a little upon the choice that was to be made, they elected seven, to be set apart to the office of deacons, whose names were as follows: There was Stephen a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit, of whose heroic character and glorious end we shall presently have occasion to speak; and Philip, who long continued an ornament and blessing to the church, being at length raised to a yet higher character: and Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicolas, who was not a Jew born, but a proselyte of Antioch, whom they were the more willing to fix in this office, as his peculiar relation to the Grecians would make him especially careful to remedy any neglect of them, which might insensibly have prevailed.

6 These were the persons in whom they chose to repose this confidence; and accordingly they presented them before the apostles: And they, having prayed that a divine blessing might attend all their ministrations and care, laid [their] hands upon them, that so they might not only express their solemn designation to the office, but might confer upon them such extraordinary gifts as would qualify them yet more abundantly for the full discharge of it.

7 And the consequence was, that the matter of complaint being thus removed, and the apostles more... more entirely at leisure to attend to the great and peculiar duties of their office, the word of God grew and the number of the disciples in and about Jerusalem was greatly multiplied; and in particular what might seem very surprising, a great multitude of priests became obedient to the faith, notwithstanding all those prejudices, which they had imbibed against this new doctrine, from the scorn with which the great and the noble generally treated it, and the loss of those temporal advantages which they might be called to resign out of regard to it.

And Stephen, having for sometime discharged the office of a deacon with great honour and fidelity, was raised by divine Providence and Grace to the superior honours of an evangelist and a martyr; and was enabled, in a very extraordinary manner, to confirm the doctrine he taught; for, being full of grace and of power, and eminently qualified for the performance of wonderful things, he wrought many extraordinary miracles and great signs among the people.

But, notwithstanding all the miracles that were done by him, there arose some of the synagogue, which is called [that] of the libertines, as having been the children of freed men, that is, of number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith.

8 And Stephen, full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people.

9 Then there arose certain of the synagogue, which is called the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians; The superior honours of an evangelist, &c.] It plainly appears from the foregoing history of the institution of the office that it was not as a deacon that he preached; but the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit he received, eminently qualified him for that work: And no doubt, many Christians, not stately devoted to the ministry, and whose furniture was far inferior to his, would be capable of declaring Christ and his gospel to strangers in an edifying and useful manner, and would not fail accordingly to do it, as Providence gave them a call and opportunity.

k Full of grace and power.] So many valuable copies read χριστός, instead of πνεύμα, that I thought myself obliged to follow them. See Dr. Mill in loc.
of emancipated captives or slaves, and [some] of the Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them who were natives of Cilicia and Asia, who endeavoured to prevent the success of his preaching, by disputed with Stephen¹, and arguing with him concerning his doctrine. And though they had an high opinion of their own sufficiency to manage the dispute, yet such was the force of his reasoning, that they were not able to stand against the wisdom and Spirit with which he spake, the divine Spirit itself guiding his thoughts and animating his expressions, which raised him far above the strength of his natural genius, and made him indeed a wonder to all that heard him. (Compare Mat. x. 20. and Luke xxi. 15.)

Then, as they found they were incapable of defending themselves by fair argument, they had recourse to a most mean and dishonest fraud; for they suborned men to depose and say, We heard him, even this very Stephen, speak blasphemous words against Moses, and [against] God himself, the great author of that religion which Moses taught us by command from him.

And as the law required that a blasphemer should be stoned, (Lev. xxiv. 16.) they stirred up the people, and the elders, and the scribes, especially those who were in stations of authority against him: and setting upon [him], they violently seized and dragged him away with them, and brought [him] to the Sanhedrin which

² Disputed with Stephen.] As the most considerable synagogues in Jerusalem had each a kind of academy or college of young students belonging to it, instructed under some celebrated rabbi, it is no wonder such nurseries should afford disputants, like these spoken of here.

³ Blasphemous words against Moses, and against God.] See note a on chap. vi. in the beginning of the next section.
which was then sitting; and, there, in presence of their highest court of judicature, they proscribed the affair to an issue, which will be described in the following sections.

IMPROVEMENT.

We see how difficult it is, even for the wisest and best of men, to manage a great multitude of affairs, without inconvenience and without reflection: It will therefore be our prudence not to intrust with the distribution of charities; It is a solemn trust, for which their characters at least are to answer to the world now, and they themselves must keep an office, in concurrence with their ministers. It is their business to serve tables. Happy those societies who make choice of men of an attested character, and of those who appear by the virtues and graces of the Christian temper to be in that sense full of the Holy Spirit!

While these good men are dealing forth their liberal contributions, (by which, while Christ has any poor members remaining we are still to testify our love to him) let ministers devote themselves with all attention to prayer and to the ministry of the word. Let those, who would administer the word with comfort and success, remember of how great importance it is, that it be watered with prayer, falling upon it as the former and as the latter rain: and especially see to it, that, by the constant exercise of lively devotion in secret, in their families, and on other proper social occasions, they keep their grace vigorous and active; that, living continually in such a state of nearness to God, they may be qualified to speak in his name with that dignity, tenderness, and authority, which nothing but true and elevated devotion can naturally express, or can long retain.

Let
Stephen is charged with blasphemy before the Sanhedrin.

SECT. xii.

Let us adore that efficacy of divine grace, whereby a multitude of the Jewish priests were made obedient to the faith; and let us Ver. heartily pray, that, if there are any who claim a sacred character, 7 and yet, out of regard to worldly honour or interest, oppose the power and purity of the gospel, they may be convinced by the influence of the blessed Spirit, they they can have no interest in contradiction to the truth, and that they are happy in purchasing, at the highest price, that gospel which may enrich them for ever. 9 In whatsoever station we are fixed, whether in the world or the church, let us always remember our obligation to plead the cause of the gospel, and to render a reason for the hope that is in us. If this engage us in disputation with men of corrupt minds, we must still hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, knowing that he is faithful that has promised. (Heb. x. 23.)

11 The vilest charge may, as in this instance, be fixed upon the most worthy men; piety may be defamed as blasphemy, and that which is the true love of our country as treason against it: But there is one supreme Lawgiver and Judge, who will not fail, sooner or later, to plead the cause of injured innocence. And when we read of this vile attack that was made by perjury on the character and life of Stephen, we may take occasion to adore that wise and powerful providence which so remarkably exerts itself to defend our reputation and our lives from those false and venomous tongues which, were it not for that secret invisible restraint, might, like a two-edged sword, so quickly destroy both.

SECT. XIII.

Stephen, being accused before the Sanhedrin of blasphemy, begins his vindication of himself from that charge, Acts VI. 13, to the end. VII. 1.—14.

It was observed in the last section, that those Jews who had been confounded by the force and spirit of Stephen's argument and address, had brought him before the Sanhedrin; and while he stood before them as a prisoner, they set up certain false witnesses, who said, This detestable man is incessantly speaking blasphemous words against this holy place in which we now are, that is, against Jerusalem and the temple, and likewise against the divinely inspired law, as one that has no reverence at all for its authority.

For we ourselves have heard him saying, that this same Jesus of Nazareth, whom he celebrates so much upon every occasion as the long expected and

And set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place, and the law.

The high-priest calls upon him to answer the charge.

And all that sat in the council, looking stedfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.

Acts VII. 1. Then said the high-priest, Are these things so?

* Shall change the customs which Moses delivered to us. I see no reason to believe that Stephen knew the mystery of the abolition of the Mosaic law, which the apostles do not seem immediately to have understood: and it is much less probable, that he openly taught what Paul himself many years after insinuated with so much caution. (Compare Gal. ii. 2.) This therefore seems to have been the inference they drew from what he taught, of the destruction he denounced on the Jews, if they continued in their unbelief. But it was a very precarious inference, as the city and temple had been destroyed before, without any repeal of the law, and therefore they were false witnesses.

† Take the countenance of an angel. Grosnus, Brennus, L'Enfant, and some others interpret this as a proverbial expression of the majesty and beauty of his countenance, arising from a transport of inward joy, in the consciousness of innocence and expectation of glory, though he had so cruel a sentence and execution in view: (Compare Gen. xxxiii. 10, 1 Sam. xxix. 9. Eccles. viii. 1, and Esth. [Apoc. xv. 13.) And upon this the translation of 1727 takes the strange liberty of rendering it, They saw an air of majesty in his aspect. But with Dr. Hammond and Benson, I rather think, there was a supernatural splendor, as on the countenance of Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 29.—It was indeed a most astonishing instance of the incorrigible hardness and wickedness of their hearts, that they could murder a man, on whom God put such a visible glory, similar to that of their great legislator: but perhaps, they might ascribe it to magic; and we know how little they made of other miracles, the truth of which they were compelled to acknowledge. Compare Acts iv. 16 e Stephen
And upon this Stephen began a large discourse, in which, in the softest and most offensive manner, he solemnly declared his firm persuasion of the divine authority of that law, which he was charged with blaspheming; and proved to them from their own scriptures, that God's gracious regards to his people were not limited within the boundaries of that land, nor appropriated to those who were subjected to the Mosaic ritual; at the same time reminding them of some instances, in which they had ungratefully rejected those whom God had appointed for their deliverers, that they might be cautioned against repeating the fault in this instance to their final ruin. He therefore traced the matter to its original, and said, Men, brethren, and fathers, I beseech you all, whether old or young, whether of greater or lower rank, to hearken to me, while I offer these things, which may not only serve for my own vindication from this unjust charge, but may likewise remind you of some important particulars, which it is your highest interest in present circumstances seriously to consider. It is well known to all of you, that long before our law was given, or the place in which we stand had any peculiar sanctuary, the God of glory appeared to our father Abraham, by some resplendent and majestic symbol of his presence, while he was yet with his idolatrous ancestors in Mesopotamia, (Gen.xi.31) before he dwelt in Charran, which for a while he did, after he had removed his abode from Ur of the Chaldeans, which was the land of his nativity. In this idolatrous land it was, that God appeared and said to him, Depart from this thy native country, and from thy kindred, who are now alienated from my worship, and come away from this land, which for so long a time has as Stephen began a large discourse.] Le Clerc, with a mixture of rashness and weakness, into which he frequently falls in his Reflections on Scripture, not understanding the true scope of this excellent discourse, presumes to censure it, as containing many things not to the purpose, as well as many slips of memory, though it is expressly said, (ver. 55.) that Stephen was full of the Holy Spirit when he delivered it. I am persuaded, that it will be admired by all that well understand it, and hope the hints I have given in the paraphrase will lead the reader into the true design of it, and shew the propriety of the circumstances introduced. Dr. Benson has illustrated it in a large and very judicious manner, in his History, Vol. I. p. 123—135, which I shall leave the curious reader to consult. I only add, that, had not Stephen been interrupted by their fury, it is probable, he would have added some other articles, and have summed up the discourse in such a manner, as to shew, that the main design of it was to humble that hollowness of spirit, which occasioned their rejecting Jesus and his gospel.

\[2\] And he said, Men, brethren, and fathers, hearken; The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran,

\[3\] And said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into thycoiioUy, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into thy kindred, and come into thy kindred, and come into Abraham was brought from an idolatrous country to Canaan.

4 Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his Father was dead, he removed him into this land wherein ye now dwell.

5 And he gave him none inheritance in it, no not so much as to set his foot on; yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child.

4 After his father died.] Many passages in Stephen's speech have been objected to, as contradictory to the account given of the same facts in the Old Testament. I can by no means acquiesce in the answer which some have given, that Luke's inspiration, only secured to us an exact account of what Stephen said: for it seems very unreasonable to suppose, that on so extraordinary an occasion the Spirit so expressly promised in such circumstances, even to the seventh as well as to the apostles, should lead him into frequent and palpable slips of memory, into which it is not probable any intelligent Christian minister would now fall in a like circumstance. It seems therefore much more honourable to Christianity to suppose, that, if there are any passages here which cannot be reconciled with the passages of the Old Testament to which they refer, (which most that have been objected to certainly may,) it is owing to some error of transcribers, from which, as it is plain from various readings, even the copies of the sacred books have not always been secure, as without a continued miracle it is impossible they should. But as for what is here urged, as if it were inconsistent with Gen. xi. 26, 22. xii. 4. from whence it is argued, that, as Terah was but 70 years old when Abraham was born, and Abraham but 75 when he departed from Haran, these make no more than 145 years; but Terah lived to be 205, and so must have lived 60 years after Abraham left Haran, whereas Stephen affirms, that Abraham went not from thence till after his father died: In answer to this, it is well observed by Mr. Biscoe, (cap. xviii. p. 595—600.) that this objection is built upon an unproved supposition, that Abraham was Terah's eldest son, or that he was born in his 70th year; not to insist on the solution which is offered to this difficulty by Le Clerc, Knatchbull, Cappellus, and others, that, according to the Samaritan copy, Terah lived but 145 years.—Cladenvius's solution, built on the distinction between κατατελείων sojourning and μισθωμεν, fixing his abode there by the purchase of a sepulchre, seems too mean a subterfuge to be particularly discussed.

4 Even to his seed.] The particle ἐν so often signifies even, that I think it much more natural to render it thus, and to consider this clause as explaining the former, in order to avoid that express contradiction, which seems to arise from translating it as we do.
He was accepted of God before his circumcision.

had no child, and humanly speaking it was not likely he ever should have one: but the faith of our pious ancestor triumphed over all these seeming difficulties, and joyfully embraced the divine revelation and promise.

6 And when God had brought Abraham into this country, he did not keep him and his posterity here till the time they were to enter upon the possession of it, in consequence of this divine grant, but, on the contrary, God spake [to him] thus in a vision, (Gen. xv. 13, 14.) "that his seed should sojourn and be strangers in a foreign land, and they among whom they sojourn shall enslave and abuse them; and these events, with the circumstances preparatory to them, shall extend themselves to the full period of four hundred years. And the nation to which they shall be enslaved, said God in the same oracle, I will assuredly judge, and punish with a righteous and tremendous severity: And afterwards they shall come out of that land in which thou now dwellest, and erecting a temple for the performance of my worship here." This was God's promise to him while he was yet uncircumcised, and in confirmation of it he gave him, as you well know, the covenant of circumcision, a sacred rite, which far from blaspheming, I revere as the solemn zeal of this contract between God and Abraham: And so being circumcised himself, as soon as God required it, (Gen. xvii. 23, 24.) he quickly after begat Isaac, and circumcised him also on the eighth day, according to the divine appointment; and Isaac [begat] Jacob, and Jacob [begat] the twelve patriarchs, who were the respective heads of our twelve tribes of Israel.

6 And God spake on this wise, that his seed should sojourn in a strange land, and that they should bring them into bondage, and en treat them evil four hundred years.

7 And the nation to whom they shall be in bondage, will I judge, said God: and after that shall they come forth, and serve me in this place.

8 And he gave him the covenant of circumcision: and so Abraham begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day: and Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob begat the twelve patriarchs.

And

4 Four hundred years.] Many good critics suppose, that this is mentioned here, as well as in the text from which it is quoted, (Gen. xv. 13.) as a round sum, without taking notice of the broken number, the exact time being four hundred and thirty years, as Moses determines it, Exod. xii. 40. with whom the apostle Paul agrees, Gal. iii. 17. For Abraham was 75 years old, when he came into Canaan, (Gen. xiii. 4.) which being considered as the beginning of the period, from thence to the birth of Isaac was 25 years; and Isaac was sixty years old when he begat Jacob, who went to Egypt at 130; which numbers added together make 215 years, and from thence to the time of Israel's departure from Egypt was 215 years more. (See Joseph. Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 15, [al. 6. i. 2.].—But Moses, in the text quoted from Exodus, refers to the whole period of the sojourning of Abraham and his family in Canaan and Egypt, as strangers in those lands: whereas this promise being made but a little before Isaac's birth, and the prediction taking place from that event must include only 405 years, which might in a round sum be yet more easily and properly called four hundred. See Bp. Patrick on Gen. xvi. 13. and Dr. Whitby in loc.

9 And the patriarchs moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt: but God was with him.

10 And delivered him out of all his afflictions, and gave him favour and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh king of Egypt: and he made him governor over Egypt, and all his house.

11 Now there came a dearth over all the land of Egypt and Canaan, and great affliction: and our fathers found no sustenance.

12 But when Jacob heard that there was corn in Egypt, he sent out our fathers first.

13 And at the second time they

And in those days the providence of God began to work for the accomplishment of that surprising prediction, which I mentioned but now: For the rest of the patriarchs, though their relation to such holy ancestors might have taught them a much better lesson, being moved with envy, at the superior regard which Jacob shewed to his favourite son, most inhumanly sold Joseph their brother into Egypt, where he became a slave, and went through a great variety of calamities: Nevertheless God was with him there, though no longer in the promised land, and made that country a scene of very glorious providence towards him. And he there delivered him out of all his afflictions, which his integrity and piety had brought upon him, and gave him favour and high veneration, on account of that distinguished wisdom which appeared to be in him, in the sight of Pharaoh king of Egypt; and he constituted him ruler over the land of Egypt, and in particular over all his royal house, committing all things in the palace as well as elsewhere, to his direction and management, even to the management of this despised Joseph, whom his brethren (then the whole house of Israel) had most outrageously insulted and abused, and even sold for a slave.

And according to the predictions of Joseph, which had awakened so great an attention, when seven years of plenty were past, a famine came upon all the land of Egypt, and extended itself over Canaan too; and this calamity reduced them to such great affliction and distress, that they knew not how to subsist, and even in this fruitful land our fathers did not find sufficient sustenance to support themselves and their families. But Jacob hearing that there was corn in Egypt, ordered his sons to go and fetch them a supply from thence, and sent our fathers, the ten patriarchs thither first, keeping Benjamin with him at home. And the second time that they

Being moved with envy.] From what Stephen mentions of the story of Joseph, it was obvious to infer, (as many good writers have observed,) that the greatest favourites of heaven might suffer by the envy of those who were called the Israel of God; and might be exalted by him after having been rejected by them: A thought worthy of their consideration with respect to Jesus; but it would not have been proper directly to insert such a reference in the paraphrase, as prudence would not allow Stephen in the beginning of this finely adjusted defence, to say expressly what they could not have borne to hear, as appears by the manner in which they resisted his application of these premises when he was drawing towards a conclusion.

they went, when sorely against his good father's will Benjamin accompanied them, Joseph was made known to his brethren; and as the matter was immediately made public, the family and descent of Joseph was discovered to Pharaoh, of which he had not been particularly informed before.

14 And upon this, with the full consent of that generous prince, Joseph sent and invited his aged father Jacob, and all his kindred to him into Egypt; who accordingly went down thither in a company, amounting in the whole, together with their wives, to seventy-five souls,5 without reckoning Jacob himself, and Joseph's family already there. And thus their sojournin in that land began, during which they were still under the care of divine Providence, till the time of their return to Canaan approached, of which I shall presently speak.

IMPROVEMENT.

Thus loud may the clamour of malice and falsehood rise against innocence and truth. Incessant blasphemy is charged on one of the most pious of men; and we wonder at it the less, since it was charged upon Jesus himself; and, if they called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more those of his household? (Mat. x. 25.) His disciple learns of him not to render evil for evil, but ans

5 Amounting to seventy-five souls.] Of the various solutions which learned men have given of the seeming inconsistency between this account, and that given by Moses, (Gen. xlvi. 27. Exod. i. 5. and Deut. x. 22.) which makes them but seventy, (with which also Josephas agrees, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 7. [al. 4.] § 4.) the most probable seems to be this. Moses expressly leaves out all the wives, (Gen. xlvi. 26.) whom he had said before the sons of Israel carried with them, (ver. 5.) and only speaks of those that came out of Jacob's loins, inserting in the catalogue that he gives of his children, two grand-children of Judah, (to supply the place of Er and Onan, who had died in Canaan.) Hezron and Hamul, though it is probable they were not born till after Jacob's arrival in Egypt; and, having first computed them at sixty-six, he then adds Joseph and his two sons that were before in Egypt, and, reckoning Jacob with them, makes the whole number to amount to seventy. But Stephen speaks of all that went down with him, and so excludes Jacob himself, and the two afterwards born, and Joseph and his children, which reduces the number thus: The eleven brethren with Dinah their sister, and fifty-two that had descended from them, amount to sixty-four; to which adding eleven wives, (some of the patriarchs having probably buried theirs, and but few of their children being yet married,) they amount in all to seventy-five. See Pool's Synopsis, and Whitty in loc. and Biscoe, at Boyle's Lees. chap. xviii. p. 602—606.—Could the reading of παράδωκας or παράδωκας instead of παραδωκας (which Beza mentions as a conjecture,) be supported by proper authorities, so that it might be rendered all amounting to seventy souls, it would make the whole matter quite easy. Groton also supposes, that the original reading here was seventy, and that the Septuagint copy was altered to its present form, to suit with the mistaken reading of seventy five; for, in the two first texts referred to in the beginning of this note, the Septuagint read seventy-five, while in Deut. x. 22. they agree with the Hebrew, and read seventy, which is somewhat strange.
swers in the language of calm reason, and of meek though powerful conviction.

While Stephen leads back our contemplation to so many remarkable facts of the Old Testament, let us reflect upon them with those devout affections which become the Israel of God. Let us adore the God of glory that appeared to Abraham, and called him forth to be so bright an example of faith and piety, in leaving his country and kindred, to follow the leadings of providence, when he knew not in what settlement they should end. Let us, in imitation of him, whose children, if true believers, we also are, sit loose to every thing in this world, that we may be ready to leave it when God shall, by one providence or another, give the signal for our remove. If the next step of duty lies plain before us, let us trust our leader to mark out all that follow, in such an order, and to such an end, as he shall think fit; secure of this, that, while we follow infinite Wisdom, we cannot wander out of the way to true happiness, and that all the divine promises shall certainly be accomplished, whatever cross event may seem to interpose and obstruct.

When God appointed that the seed of Abraham should sojourn, and suffer in a strange land, the pious patriarch acquiesced in it: nor let us be over anxious about the difficulties into which our posterity may be led. Let us adore the divine goodness, that he has established his covenant with us, and with our seed after us; and while we, in imitation of Abraham, bring our infant offspring to receive the solemn seal of that covenant, let us remember our engagements to instruct them, as they grow up, in the tenor of it, and labour to the utmost to engage their own personal consent to it; and then they will be truly rich and free, though in the penury of a famished land, or under the rod of an Egyptian tyrant.

The mysterious conduct of divine Providence with regard to the pious Joseph, who became a slave, that he might be made a prince, and who was trained up for the golden chain in the discipline of iron fetters, may surely be sufficient to teach us to judge nothing before the time, and to wait the end of the Lord, before we arraign the seeming severity of a part of his conduct towards those, whom we might imagine the most proper objects of his regard. And surely it will appear none of the least considerable of those rewards, which Providence bestowed on the approved and distinguished virtue of Joseph, that he had an opportunity of nourishing his pious father in his declining days, of spreading a mild and pleasant ray over the evening of a life, which had been so often beclouded with storms, and of sheltering (as it were) under his princely robe, that hoary head, which had once been turned into a fountain of tears over the bloody fragments of the many coloured coat.
Acts VII. 15.

So Jacob went down into Egypt, and died, he and our fathers.

16 And were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money; and there was no affront to his memory. This solution, which is advanced by the learned Bochart (Hierozon. Part I. c. ii. cap. 43.) Dr. Benson, and others, is so natural, that I will not trouble the readers with the mention of several others, which may be seen in Dr. Whitby, Sir Norton Knatchbull, and Brennus; but shall only observe, that, if this be not allowed, (which has indeed no copy to support it, the easiest 17 But when the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had sworn to Abraham, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt.

18 Till another king arose, which knew not Joseph:

19 The same dealt subtilly with our kindred, and evil entreated our fathers, so that they cast out their young children, to the end they might not live.

pieces of silver, of the sons of Emmor [the father] of Sychem, from whom in particular, the place was named; and the Amorites having afterwards seized it, Jacob had by force recovered it out of their hands. (Compare Josh. xxiv. 32. with Gen. xlvi. 22.) And it was by their own direction the heads of our tribes were kept to be interred here, that they might testify thereby to their posterity, as long as their embalmed bodies continued unburied in Egypt, that they died in the faith of Israel's being led forth from thence and settled in the land of promise, which accordingly happened.

And to make way for the accomplishment of this event, as the time of the promise drew near, which God had sworn to Abraham, (Gen. xxii. 16, 17.) the people of Israel, though they had such a small beginning, grew very numerous, and multiplied exceedingly in Egypt: And they continued there for many years in very comfortable circumstances till another king arose, of a different race and family from the former, who knew not Joseph, and had no regard to his memory. (Exod. i. 8.) He therefore used them in a barbarous way, and forming crafty and treacherous designs against our kindred, lest they in time should grow to be too powerful, treated our fathers most injuriously, and cruelly contrived to cut them off from being a people, by casting all their male infants in obedience to a most inhuman order that he published, to be exposed, or cast into the river Nile, that in a little time their race might perish, and be quite extinct. (Exod. i. 22.)

Such was the miserable state to which our fathers were reduced in which afflictive persecuting siest sense seems to be that which Mr. L'Enfant has given in his note, that Jacob died, he and our fathers, and they [that is, our fathers] were carried over to Sychem, and buried; he that is, Jacob] in the sepulchre which Abraham bought for a sure of money, and they [that is, the patriarchs, in that which was bought of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem.—That Emmor was very justly rendered Emmor [the father of Sychem, (as he is declared to be in the Old Testament,) though the relation be not here expressed in the original, sufficiently appears from other passages, in which not only the relation of a son, of which we have frequent instances, but other relations too are left to be supplied. Moses was born, and educated in the court of Pharaoh.

Moses was born, and was exceeding fair, and nourished up in his father’s house three months:

21 And when he was cast out, Pharaoh’s daughter, took him up and nourished him for her own son.

22 And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words, and in deeds

b Exceeding beautiful.] This our translators render in the margin, fair to God, which is the literal sense of the original καθαρός τω Θεώ. Grutius and others have observed, it is a common Hebrewism, being no more than an emphatical expression to denote his extraordinary beauty which might perhaps be not unfairly rendered divinely beautiful, the name of God being often introduced to express such things as were extraordinary in their kind. So in the Hebrew, what we translate great wrestlings, is wrestlings of God; (Gen. xxx. 8.) goodly cedars are cedars of God; (Psal. lxxx. 17.) great mountains are mountains of God; (Psal. xxxvi. 6.) and an exceeding great city is a city of God; (Jon. iii. 3.) πόλις μεγάλη τω Θεώ; Saphira. And in like manner, in the New Testament, (2 Cor. x. 4.) weapons mighty through God, επί τω Θεώ, might not improperly be rendered very strong weapons. This then agrees with what is said of Moses, (Exod. ii. 2.) that he was a goodly child; and, in the account Josephus gives of him, he says, “that, when he was but three years old, his extraordinary beauty was such, that it struck every one that saw him; and, as they carried him about, persons would leave their work to look at him.” (Antig. lib. ii. cap. 9. [at 5.] § 6.) The fame of it had also spread among the Hebræans; for Justin in his History relates from Trogus, (lib. xxxvi. cap. 2.) that, besides the inheritance of his father’s knowledge, whom he takes to have been Joseph, his beautiful appearance greatly recommended him. See Grutius and Whiby in loc.

c The daughter of Pharaoh took him up. All these extraordinary circumstances relating to the birth, preservation, education, genius, and character of Moses, serve to aggravate the crime of Israel in rejecting him, when he offered himself to them as a deliverer under so many advantages, and when Providence had so wonderfully interested itself in his favour.

d Educated in all the wisdom of the Egyptians.] Geography, geometry, arithmetic, astronomy, natural history, physics, and hieroglyphics, are all mentioned by ancient writers, as branches of Egyptian literature. As for magic in the bad sense of the word, it is not to be imagined that so good a man would have any thing to do with it. Several ancient testimonies to the extraordinary learning of Moses may be seen in the following passages: Phil. de Vit. Mos. lib. i. p. 470. Justin Mart. Quest. ad Orthod. xxv. Orig. contra Cels. lib. iii. p. 139. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i. p. 343.—I only add, it must have been a self denial, which none but a lover of learning, and one who has made some progress in it, can understand, for a person of such a genius and education, in the prime of life, to leave the polite court of Egypt, and live as a retired shepherd in the Arabian desert.

Mighty
When forty years old, he goes to visit his brethren.

23 And when he was full forty years old it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel.

24 And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian:

25 For he supposed his brethren would have understood, how that God by his hand would deliver them; but they understood not.

Mighty in discourses.] It may seem difficult to reconcile this with what Moses himself says of his own want of eloquence (Exod. iv. 10.) Some have attempted to do it by explaining this expression, as importing the wisdom of the laws he gave as they explain the next clause, mighty in action; of the miracles he wrought. But Stephen seems rather to refer to what he was in the court of Pharaoh, than to what he afterwards proved. I conclude therefore, that it expresses such a weight and solidity in his counsels and speeches, as may be very consistent with the want of a flowing elocution, and the remarkable calmness of his natural temper would render him more entirely master of himself on great occasions, rather than others of readier speech with warmer passions.

And in actions.] Archbishop Tillotson (in his work, Vol. II. p. 23.) and many others think, that this refers to a story mentioned by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 10. al. 5.) that, when Moses dwelt in Pharaoh's court, the Ethiopians invaded Egypt, and Moses, being made general in the war against them, gave them a total defeat, and drove back the small remainder of their forces in confusion to their own country.

He supposed that his brethren would have understood.] They might have known, that the time drew near which God had prefixed in his promise to Abraham, in a prediction which might probably be delivered down by tradition, and which would be more likely to be remembered under their oppression, as the patriarchs had in were so exceeding stupid, that they did not understand it. And the next day he shewed himself again to two of them, as they were quarrelling together, and would have interposed between them, and have persuaded them to live in peace and friendship saying, Men, my friends, consider you are brethren, descended from Jacob our common ancestor, and now too joined in affliction as well as in religion, which ought doubly to cement your affections to each other, why then do ye injure one another? But he that injured his neighbour, unable to bear with his plain and faithful reproof, insolently thrust him away, saying, What hast thou to do with this controversy? Who has made thee a ruler and a judge over us? Wilt thou kill me, as I know thou didst yesterday slay the Egyptian? His blood may cost thee dear enough without adding mine to the account. (Exod. ii. 13, 14.) Then Moses, as he found the matter was discovered, and was apprehensive that in consequence of it the Egyptian power would be soon armed against him, while the Israelites were not inclined to use any efforts for his protection, nor to put themselves under his guidance, presently fled from Egypt at this saying, and became a sojourner in the land of Midian; where nevertheless Providence furnished him with a comfortable settlement, though in circumstances of great retirement; for he became the chief shepherd to Jethro, the prince of the country, and marrying Zipporah, his daughter he begat two sons Gershom and Eliezer.

And when forty years more were fulfilled, in which Israel had continued under this bondage, and Moses had been trained up in that humble and retired life for the great work for which God had intended him, the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a flame of fire in the midst of his, to enter into some treaty with him relating to it. And when they saw a person of so much dignity, authority, and influence, whom God had so wonderfully preserved, interposing in this generous and heroic manner, which plainly shewed that he in good earnest intended at all hazards to do his utmost for their deliverance, it would have been highly reasonable for them to have taken occasion, from this action of Forty years after, God appears to him in a burning bush.

31 When Moses saw it, he wondered at the sight; and as he drew near to behold it, the voice of the Lord came unto him.

32 Saying, I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Then Moses trembled, and durst not behold.

33 Then said the Lord to him, Put off thy shoes from thy feet; for the place where thou standest is holy ground.

34 I have seen the affliction of my people which is in Egypt, and I have heard their groaning, and am come down to deliver them: and now come, I will send thee into Egypt.

35 This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who a bush, while he was feeding the flock of Jethro his father-in-law in the wilderness of mount Sinai, even of that mount Sinai which (as you know) lay in the confines of the Midianite country, not far from the Red Sea. (Exod. iii. 1, 2.)

And Moses, seeing [it], admired the vision, for 31 the bush burned with fire, and yet was not consumed; and as he drew near to behold and survey [it] more particularly, the voice of the Lord came unto him out of the bush, [Saying] 32 “I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, who led them safely through all the difficulties of life, and still manifests a friendship to them; in consequence of which, I am not even now ashamed to own that title.” And Moses upon this, perceiving that it was God himself who was there present and spake to him, trembled at this appearance of his Majesty, and did not dare to behold it, as he intended, with a curious regard. And the Lord said unto him, 33 “Loose thy shoes from thy feet; for the place in which thou standest is now holy ground, while I thus visibly appear upon it; and it becomes thee (by that usual token of respect before princes) to express thy reverence for my royal presence. I have surely seen the 34 evil and oppressive treatment of my people which are in Egypt, and I have heard their groaning; and moved with pity and compassion at their sufferings, I am come down to deliver them by thine hand: And now therefore come, and lay aside immediately thy cares of a shepherd for others of much greater importance, and I will send thee into Egypt, to demand their dismissal from that proud tyrant who so injuriously detains and oppresses them.” (Exod. iii. 5—10.)

And thus you see, what in present circum-35 stances it will be proper for you to reflect upon, that

This Moses whom they renounced, saying, with

1. Loose thy shoes from thy feet] It was formerly in the eastern nations, and is now in the southern, esteemed a ceremony of respect, to put off the shoes when approaching a superior, lest any of the dirt or dust clinging to the shoes should be brought near him, and that the person approaching bare-foot might tread more cautiously. This, which perhaps was introduced at first in court apartments where rich carpets might be used, the King of kings requires to be done in a desert, as a token of the infinitely greater reverence due to him. (Compare Josh. v. 15, and Eccles. v. 1.) On the same principle, it seems, the priests ministered thus in the tabernacle and temple, no direction being given for shoes or sandals as a part of their dress, though all the rest of it was so particularly prescribed.

1. This Moses, whom they renounced.] As the terms of high respect, in which Stephen through with disdain, Who has constituted thee a ruler and a judge? even this very person did God, by the hand of the angel who appeared to him in the bush sent [to be] a ruler and a redeemer. And though he hesitated for a while, he afterwards complied; and at length led them forth in triumph, a willing people listed under his banner, doing wonders and signs in the land of Egypt, and afterwards in the Red Sea, where Pharaoh and his host were overwhelmed; and working many other miracles in the wilderness for the space of forty years, where indeed they were every day miraculously fed by manna from heaven, and conducted by the pillar of fire and cloud.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. He is indeed faithful that hath promised; he remembereth his 17 covenant for ever, the word which he commanded even to a thousand generations. (Psal. ev. 8.) He multiplied his people in Egypt, that Canaan might not want inhabitants, when the sinners against their own souls that then held it should be cut off: And when he had determined so to multiply the holy seed, vain were all the attempts of the ungrateful Egyptians to destroy the kindred of him by whom, as they had formerly confessed, their lives had been saved: (Gen. xlvii. 25.) Yet was the rod of the wicked permitted for a while to rest upon their back, that the remembrance of the bondage and the cruelties they had there endured might, through-out all generations, be a source of joyful and grateful obedience to that God who delivered them from the land of Egypt, and from the house of bondage, and an engagement to serve him who had so illustriously triumphed over idolatry, as it were in its head-quarters. The church has often had its winter season, yet Providence has over-ruled the severity of that, to conduce to the verdure and beauty of its spring, and to the fruitfulness of its summer and its autumn.

20, 21 Moses was born in the midst of this persecuting time, and when exposed, was the care of divine Providence; the compassion which God put into the heart of this Egyptian princess, was to draw after it a train of most important consequences. Moses was fitted for the great part he was to act in the close of life by very different different means; the learning, the magnificence, and politeness of the court of Egypt were to do their part, that he might be able to appear with honour in that court as an ambassador, and Vfr. to conduct himself with becoming dignity as a prince; but they could not do the whole: They were to illustrate his generosity in seeking, in the midst of such various pleasures, and at the expense of such high prospects to vindicate his oppressed brethren, whose sorrow touched his heart, and whose groans pierced (if I may so express it) through all the music of the court, through all the martial noise of the camp, in which he might sometimes reside and command: Glorious triumph of faith, that when he was come to such full age, he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and chose rather to meet with affliction in the cause of Christ, than to enjoy the temporary pleasures of sin! (Heb. xi. 24, 25.)

But forty years of retirement in the desert of Midian, spent in the meditations and devotions, for which the life of a shepherd gave so great advantage, must ripen him to feed God's people Israel; while they, in the mean time, justly groaned under the continuance of that bondage from which they were so backward to accept of a proffered deliverer.

At length light breaks in upon them in the midst of their darkness: Let us turn aside and behold with proper affection this great sight, the bush burning but not consumed; and therein an emblem of the preservation of the church, even amidst the fiercest flames. Let us hear with pleasure that voice which proclaims to all that hear it, so compassionate and faithful a God, which opens so glorious and lasting a hope; I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. "Thou art not, O Lord, the God of the dead but of the living, (Mat. xxii. 32.) these pious patriarchs therefore live with thee, and their believing seed shall partake of that life and joy in the city, which because thou hast prepared for them, thou art not ashamed to be called their God." (Heb. xi. 16.)

How does God manifest the heart of a parent towards these his oppressed children! I have seen, I have seen the affliction of Israel: Thus, O Lord, dost thou see all our afflictions. Let thy church, and each of thy people, trust thee to come down for their deliverance in thine own time and way; let us with pleasure behold this Moses whom they rejected, and from whom a worthless offender could not bear a reproof, made a leader and a redeemer: So is our blessed Jesus, though once rejected and despised, exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour. It is not in vain that we have trusted, it is he that should redeem Israel. (Luke xxiv. 21.) He has conquered the tyrant of hell, he has broken our chains, he has brought us forth into a wilderness, but a wilderness in which God nourishes and and guides us; and he shall ere long have what Moses had not the honour and delight of leading all his people into the land of promise, and dividing to them a joyful and everlasting inheritance there.

SECT. XV.

Stephen proceeds in his discourse, till his audience are so enraged that they rush upon him and stone him. Acts VII. 37, to the end. VIII. 1.—

Acts VII. 37.

STEPHEN went on, in his discourse before the Sanhedrim, to mention several other circumstances concerning Moses, which he judged important to his present purpose; and having taken notice of the commission he received from God to be a ruler and deliverer, and of the wonders that he wrought in Egypt, in the Red Sea, and in the wilderness, he added, That is that Moses who expressly said to the children of Israel, (Deut. xviii. 15.) “A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you from amongst your brethren like unto me; him shall ye hear;” Thereby pointing out, that Jesus of Nazareth, who is to be regarded as the great prophet and lawgiver of Israel, by whom God has sent you, as he did by Moses, a new system of precepts, and new ample discoveries of his will. This Moses is he who was the chief in the assembly convened in the wilderness, who had the honour of conversing with the angel that spake to him there on Mount Sinai, and of transacting all plainly proves the angel to be a different person. But I think the doctrine itself, “that Christ was the God of Israel, or the angel who appeared to Moses,” a great and certain truth, capable of being evinced from many passages of the Old and New Testament, and from this passage in particular, though not from this clause: and I hope in due time to shew, that the arguments which Mr. Pierce has urged against it from Heb. xiii. 2 and ii. 2—4, are quite inconclusive.—I follow Beza, Heinsius, and the Prussian translators, in rendering וויקניד, assembly, as our translators do, Acts xix. xli. because I am persuaded it refers, not in the general to their being incorporated into one church in the appropriate sense of that word, but to their being assembled round the mountain on the solemn day when the Law was given, Exod. xix. 14, & seq.

After the law was given, Moses was soon rejected.

of our fathers; who received the lively oracles to give unto us,

39 To whom our fathers would not obey, but thrust him from them, and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt,

40 Saying unto Aaron, Make us gods to go before us: as for this Moses, which brought us out of the land of Egypt, we know not what is become of him.

41 And they made a calf in those days, and offered sacrifice unto the idol, and rejoiced in the works of their own hands.

42 Then God turned and gave them up to worship the host of heaven; as it is written in the book of the prophets, O ye house of Israel, have all things with our fathers, whom he then entered into covenant with God: (Exod. xix. 3, 17; xxiv. 7, 8:) And it was he who received the lively oracles of God, to give them unto us, even those oracles of the living Jehovah, which are so full of divine life and energy, which were delivered in so awakening and impressing a manner, and which instruct us in the way to life and happiness. Yet notwithstanding this, you cannot but remember that this is the illustrious prophet to whom our fathers, even after all the proofs of his miraculous power in Egypt and the Red Sea, would not be obedient; but acted a part yet more stupid and ungrateful than that which I mentioned before, (ver. 27, 35,) when they (as it were) thrust him from them a second time, as in contempt of all these wonderful appearances of God by him, and returned back again to Egypt in their hearts: Saying to Aaron, at the very foot of that mountain upon which God had visibly manifested himself to them, while the sound of his voice was (as it were) yet in their ears, and though they but a few days before had seen their great leader ascending up to him by an intimacy of approach allowed to no other mortal, "Make us Gods, who may march before us, and conduct us in the way; for [as for] this Moses, who indeed brought us out of the land of Egypt, we know not what is become of him, and cannot have patience to wait for him any longer. And they stupidly made a calf, in imitation of the Egyptian Apis, in those very days while they continued encamped in that remarkable situation, and brought a sacrifice to the idol, and rejoiced in the works of their own hands, as if, instead of a reproach and abomination, it had been an ornament and defence to them. (Exod. xxxii. 1, 6.) But upon this God was most righteously provoked, so that he turned, as it were, away from them, and, as in many other instances, punished one sin by letting them fall into another; yea, at length he gave them up in succeeding ages to the most abandoned, public, and general idolatry, even to worship all the host of c To whom our fathers would not be obedient.] This is observed by Stephen once and again, and he insists upon it largely, that they might see it was no new thing for Israel to rebel against God by rejecting deliverers sent from him.

Their fathers were guilty of the grossest idolatry.

of heaven with as little reserve, and as little shame, as the most stupid of the heathen nations; as it is written in the book of the prophets, and particularly in that part of the volume of which Amos was the penman, (Amos v. 25—27.) "O ye house of Israel, did ye offer victims and sacrifices to me alone, even for forty years in the wilderness?" You know, that even then you began to revolt and provoke me to jealousy with your abominations. _And you have ever since been renewing and aggravating your rebellions and treasons against me; for you have openly taken up the tabernacle of Moloch, instead of confining yourselves to mine, and have carried in public procession the star of your god Chiu or Remphan, paying a religious veneration to the emblematical figures and representations which you have made whereby to worship them; and therefore _I_ will pour out, on this generation, the wrath that you and your fathers have been so long treasuring up, and will carry you away into captivity beyond Babylon into countries more distant than those inhabited

43 Ye, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your God Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon.

4 You have openly taken up, &c.] The learned De Dieu has a most curious and amusing, but to me very unsatisfactory note, on this verse. He saw, and I wonder so many great commentators should not have seen, the absurdity of imagining, that Moses would have suffered idolatrous proc-cessions in the wilderness. Therefore he maintains, that Amos here refers to a mean-tal idolatry, by which, considering the tabernacle as a model of the visible heavens, (a fancy to be sure as old as Philo and Josephus,) they referred it, and the worship there paid, to Moloch, so as to make it in their hearts, in effect, his shrine; and there also to pay homage to Saturn, whom he would prove to be the same with Chiu or Remphan, who (as this critic thinks,) might be called their star, because some later rabbies, out of their great regard to the Sabbath, which was among the Heathen Saturn's day, have said many extravagant and ridiculous things in honour of that planet. _Lud. Capellius_ hints at this interpretation too. But the words of the prophet, and of Stephen, so plainly express the making of images, and the pomp of their superstitions processions, (see Young on Idolarity, Vol. I. p. 129—131,) that I think, if external idolatry is not referred to here, it will be difficult to prove it was ever practiced. I conclude therefore, considering what was urged in the beginning of this verse, that God here refers to the idolatry, to which in succeeding ages they were gradually given up, (after having begun to revolt in the wilderness by the sin of the golden calf,) which certainly appears (as Grotius has justly observed,) from its being assigned as the cause of their captivity; which it can hardly be conceived, the sin of their fathers in the wilderness, almost seven or eight hundred years before, could possibly be, though in conjunction with their own wicked-ess in following ages God might (as he threatened, Exod. xxxii. 54) remember that.
Compare 2 Kings xvii. 16; xvi. 3: xxix. 3.

_Moloch, and——Remphan._] Probably the sun was represented by Moloch, and some star (whether Saturn, Venus, or the Moon, I cannot determine,) by Remphan which plainly is intended to answer to Chiu (if that were the original reading) in the Old Testament; but neither the etymology of the name, nor the particular planet to which it referred, seems to me sufficiently evident. The learned reader will find a curious disser ation on this subject in _Vitringa, Observ. Sacr. Vol. I. lib. ii. cap. 1, with which he may compare Wits, Miscell. lib.
ii. diss. v. 52—17. Beza reads Re'phann for Remphan, and interprets it of some gigantic statue of Hercules, called Chiu from its strength; and Lud. Capellius and De Hammond interpret it of an Egyptian king called Remphis: But I can pronounce noththing certain concerning so obscure a point.
44 Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses, that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen:

45 Which also our fathers that came after, brought in with Jesus into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drvave out before the face of our fathers, unto the days of David:

46 Who found favour before God, and desired to find a tabernacle for the God of Jacob.

47 But Solomon built him an house.

And therefore were carried into captivity.

Nor can ye be insensible, that their crime was far more aggravated, than the idolatry of the Heathen whom they imitated, considering the exact model of religious and divine worship which God had given them: for the tabernacle of witness, in which the tables of testimony were lodged, as a constant witness of the relation between God and Israel, was with our fathers in the wilderness; a tabernacle which was made in all respects as he had appointed, who spake unto Moses, commanding him to make it exactly according to the model which he had seen in the mount. (Exod. xxv. 40.) Which also our fathers, who succeeded them in the next generation, receiving from their hands, brought in with Joshua, when he led them over Jordan into the land which had been formerly in possession of the heathen, whom God drove out from before the face of our fathers, and divided the land for an inheritance to them. And this tabernacle continued to be the resort of the pious worshippers of Israel, until the days of David, Who found favour before God, and was made remarkably successful in the wars he undertook in defence of that kingdom over which God had placed him, upon which he made it his petition, that he might have the honour to find a more stable and splendid dwelling for the God of Jacob, and with this view he consecrated a considerable part of the spoils which he had taken from the enemy towards erecting it. But as he was a man of war, and had shed blood, the offer that he made was not accepted, (1 Chron. xxviii. 3.) nor was there any temple for the worship of God, for many years after the settlement of our fathers in Canaan, till Solomon at length, by express

\[f\ Beyond Babylon, into countries more distant, &c.] Thus Dr. Prideaux (Connect. Vol. I. p. 15) reconciles Stephen's quotation with the original in Amos, where it is said, beyond Damascus; and I find no solution more natural. But Beza, observing these words to be quoted in Justin Martyr, according to the Hebrew, thinks the original reading here accidentally changed.

\[f\ The tabernacle of witness.] As Stephen had been accused of blaspheming the temple, he with great propriety takes occasion to speak of their sacred places with due reverence, as raised by special direction from God, and yet corrects that extravagant regard for them, and confidence in them, which the Jews were ready to entertain.

\[b\ Made it his petition.] So reads signifies; and, from the account the scripture gives of David, it appears how much it lay upon his heart, and how greatly he longed to find out a place for the Lord: (Compare 2 Sam. vii. 2 & seq. and Psal. cxvii. 1—5.) The gold and silver and other costly materials he had prepared for it, amount to so vast a sum, that it is not easy to give an account of it: See 1 Chron. xxii. 14; and xxix. 2—5.
press divine appointment, built him an house, which till the reign of that prince he never had commanded or permitted to be done.

Yet, after all, we are not to imagine that he permitted it even then for his own sake; for as it was acknowledged at the same time by Solomon himself, (2 Chron. vi. 18.) the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands; he they ever so rich, splendid, or majestic; as the prophet Isaiah also says, (Isa. Ixvi. 1,) where he is speaking in the name of God, "Heaven is my royal throne, and the whole earth is no more than my footstool, and how then shall my presence be confined to any particular place? What suitable house will you build for me, saith the Lord; or, what is the place of my rest? Hath not my hand made all these things, and whatever splendor they have, did I not form the materials, and endow the workmen that have fashioned them with all their art and genius? Do not imagine then that you can confer any obligation upon me by such structures as these, or by any act of homage which you can render in them; nor think that you can charm me to continue my abode there, or to be a constant guard to you, merely because you have such edifices amongst you."

And Stephen finding, by a confused murmur in the place, that they understood whether his discourse was leading them, and perceiving by the eagerness of their countenance that they would be like soon to interrupt him, applied himself more closely to his persecutors in these remarkable words, which he boldly addressed to them under the influence of the Holy Spirit, by whose immediate direction he spoke: "O ye stiff-necked, inflexible, and obstinate sinners, who though ye have received the sign of circumcision, and boast that you belong to God as his peculiar people, yet in reality are alienated from him, and uncircumcised in heart and ears, so that you will not hearken to instruction, or be tenderly and seriously affected with it, nothing can be more plain than that ye always do resist the Holy Spirit, and set yourselves in opposition to all his gracious efforts for your recovery and salvation; even as your fathers [did] in former ages, so do ye now. Which of the prophets, who were actuated by that Spirit, did not your fathers
The Jews are filled with rage at Stephen's discourse.

53. Who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it.

54. When they heard these things, they were cut out.

1 Which of the prophets did not your fathers persecute? I see no reason to conclude from hence, that many Scriptures containing the history of these persecutions are destroyed by the Jews, as Mr. Whiston maintains: (Essay for restoring, &c. p. 138.) It is natural to understand this in a limited sense, only as intimating, that most of them suffered such unworthy usage; and we know that attempts were sometimes made to cut off all the prophets of Jehovah at once. 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. Compare 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16.

2 That righteous One.] Christ was by way of eminence called so, as being above perfectly righteous. Compare Isa. lxi. 11. Zech. ix. 9. Acts iii. 13.

3 The betrayers and murderers.] It is a fine remark of Grotius, that the Sanhedrim was obliged, by virtue of its very constitution, to guard and defend the lives of the prophets with peculiar care, how much more to protect such a divine messenger as Christ was from any injurious assault? instead of which, they had not only basely deserted him, but had themselves become principals in his murder.

4 Through ranks of angels.] It seems evident from Heb. ii. 2. and Gal. iii. 19, that God made use of angels, as the instruments of forming the voice heard from mount Sinai. And, so far as I can judge of the learned Eisner's arguments, in his dissertation against Cocceius on this head, from Wollius' abstract of them, he seems to have the advantage; but this text is so properly rendered, through ranks of angels, (ς των Ἀγγέλων) that I apprehend nothing can be argued from hence, but that they grace the solemnity with their presence. Grotius explains it thus, justly observing, that it is a military word. Heu- sius has taken great pains to prove what Vatinius hints, that the word Ἀγγέλων here, as well as in the places quoted above, signifies messengers, that is, prophets, and that Ἀγγέλων is to be traced to a Chaldee etymology from נגש, a copy or explication, as if it had been said, "The law has been copied out, and expounded to you, by a series of prophets." But had this learned critic seen, how easily these expressions, as here translated, may be reconciled with the supposition, that Christ, as the great angel of God's presence presided, while troops of angels assisted, (as independent on these texts in the New Testament, it is certain they did, see Psalm lxxviii. 17.) he would not have had recourse to so forced an inter-
But he, being full of the Holy Spirit, was by no means terrified with the evil which seemed to be determined against him, but looking up stedfastly towards heaven, he saw, in a most delightful visionary representation, even while he stood in their court, a bright symbol of the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God. And being unable to contain his joy, he cried out in a sacred transport, and said, Behold, even now I see the heavens opened*, and the Son of Man that glorious sovereign whom you condemned and murdered, standing at the right hand of God, where he shall ever reign, to save his people, and at length to execute full vengeance upon his enemies; as he himself solemnly warned you, when like me he was your prisoner. (Mat. xxvi. 64)

And this declaration and reference provoked them to such a degree, that crying out with a loud voice, that they might drown that of Stephen, they stopped their own ears, as if they could not bear to hear such blasphemy, as they conceived he had spoken, and furiously rushed upon him with one accord. And casting him out of the city, by a gate which was near the place where the Sanhedrim sat, as soon as they had got without the boundaries of that sacred place, which they judged it a profanation to stain with human blood, they stoned him; and the two cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth.

55 But he being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up stedfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God.

56 And said, Behold I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God.

57 Then they cried out with a loud voice, and stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord.

58 And cast him out of the city, and stoned him; and the witnesses laid

*I see the heavens opened.] Witsius declares it as his opinion, (Miscell. lib. i. cap. xxvi. § 6.) that the heavens were really divided, or rendered transparent, so that the throne of Christ's glory there became visible. But, not to insist on many other improbable circumstances attending this hypothesis, it would then have been a miracle, if all that were present had not seen it; for on such a declaration they would naturally look up. It is much more reasonable to suppose, he saw a visionary representation. God miraculously operating on his imagination, as on Ezekiel's, when he sat in his house at Babylon among the elders of Judah, and saw Jerusalem, and seemed to himself transported thither; (Ezek viii. 1—4.) I say, miraculously operating; for the imagination is not itself capable of performing any such wonders, whatever some, very ignorant of human nature, or disingenuous enough knowingly to misrepresent it, may fancy. — I am very ready to conclude with Mr. Addison, that other martyrs, when called to suffer the last extremities, had extraordinary assistances of some similar kind, or frail mortality could not surely have endured the torments under which they rejoiced, and sometimes preached Christ to the conversion of spectators, and in some instances of their guards and tormentors too. See Addison of Christ's conversion of spectacles, chap. vii. § 5.

* Standing at the right hand of God.] Mr. N. Taylor, (in his excellent Discourse of Deism, p. 69.) observes, that Christ is generally represented sitting, but now as standing at God's right hand; that is, as risen up from the throne of his glory, to afford help to his distressed servant, and ready to receive him.

v They stoned him.] This seems like the
At his death he prays for his murderers.

60 And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge.

two witnesses, whose hands were first upon him to put him to death, (Deut. xvii. 7,) laid down their upper garments at the feet of a young man, whose name was Saul, who willingly took the charge of them, to shew how heartily he concurred with them in the execution.

And thus they stoned Stephen, who during this furious assault continued with his eyes fixed on that glorious vision, invoking his great Lord, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit; for important as the trust is, I joyfully commit it to thy powerful and faithful hand. And having nothing further relating to himself which could give him any solicitude, all his remaining thoughts were taken up in compassion to these inhuman wretches who were arming themselves for his destruction; so that, after having received many violent blows, rising as well as he could into a praying posture, and bending his knees, he cried out with a loud though expiring voice, O Lord, charge not this sin to their account with strict severity, proportionable to the weight of the offence; but graciously forgive them, as the stoning Paul at Lystra, chap. xiv. 19) to have been an act of popular fury, and exceeding the power which the Jews regularly had; which, though it might have extended to passing a capital sentence, (which yet we read nothing of here,) was not sufficient (so far as I can find on the most careful renewed examination of all Mr. Brooke's curious account) for carrying it into execution without the consent of the Romans. The Jews were more than once ready to stone Christ, not only when by their own confession they had no power to put any one to death, (John xviii. 31,) but when nothing had passed which had the shadow of a legal trial (Compare John viii. 59; x. 31; & seq.) how far they now might have formed those express notions of what the robbers call the judgment of zeal I know not; but it is certain they acted on that principle, and as if they had thought, every private Israelite had, like Phinehas, who is pleaded as an example of it, a right to put another to death on the spot, if he found him in a capital breach of the divine law; a notion by the way, directly contrary to Deut. xvii. 6, which requires at least two witnesses in capital cases, where there is a legal process. See Mr. Lardner's Cred. Part. I. Book I. chap. 2, Vol I. edit. 3. p. 112-120. Dr. Benson suggests some probable reasons, which might induce Pilate (who probably still continued procurator of Judaea) to con-

q Invoking and saying, &c.] This is the literal version of the words ἐπαναλαμβάνων τοὺς ἄνθρωπους τὸν ιερὸν τοῦτον, the name of God not being in the original. Nevertheless such a solemn prayer to Christ, in which a departing soul is thus solemnly committed into his hands, is such an act of worship, as we cannot believe any good man would have paid to a mere creature—Bp. Burnet (on the Articles, p. 48) justly observes, that Stephen here worships Christ in the very same manner, in which Christ had but a little while before worshipped the Father on the cross.

r Charge not this sin to their account.] The words in the original μὴ ἑξαπατήσωσιν τὸν ἤφθασαν ἀψιθ refurb, seem to have an emphasis, which though I have hinted in the paraphrase, (as well as I could without multiplying words, to a degree that in this circumstance would have been very improper,) I could not exactly and naturally express in the version. It is literally, Weich not out to them this sin, that is, a punishment proportionable to it: alluding (as Elsner well observes) to passages of Scripture, where God is represented as weighing men's characters and actions in the dispensations of his justice and providence. Compare 1 Sam. ii. 3. Job xxxi. 6. Prov. xii. 2. Isai. xxvi. 17. Dan. v. 27.—See Elsner. Obser. Vol. I. p. 395, 396.
Reflections on the close of Stephen's speech, and his death.

As I do from my very heart. And when he had said this, he calmly resigned his soul into his Saviour's hand, and with a sacred serenity in the midst of this furious assault he sweetly fell asleep, and left the traces of gentle composure, rather than of horror, upon his breathless corpse.

And Saul, the young man mentioned above, at whose feet the witnesses laid down their clothes, was so far from being shocked at this cruel scene, that, on the contrary, he was well pleased with his slaughter: being so full of rage and malice against the Christian name, that he thought no severities could be too great for those who thus zealously endeavoured to propagate it.

IMPROVEMENT.

Ver. Thankfully must we own the divine goodness in having fulfilled this important promise, of raising up a prophet like Moses, a prophet indeed far superior to him whom God's Israel is on the highest penalties required to hear. May we be all taught by him, and ever own that divine authority which attends all his doctrines and all his commands! By him God has given us lively oracles indeed, that may well penetrate deep into our souls, as being well contrived to animate them, and to secure their eternal life.

But O, how many of those who have heard of him, and been baptized into his name, in a more express manner than Israel was baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea, (1 Cor. x. 2) received as the idolatry of the golden calf to those of Moses: Long did the patience of God bear with Israel in succeeding ages, while the tabernacle of Moloch and the star of Remphan diverted their regards from the worship of their living Jehovah; but at length he gave them up to captivity. Well have we deserved, by our apostacy from God, to be made proportionable monuments of his wrath; yet still he continues graciously to dwell among us; and while the Jewish tabernacle, formed so exactly after the divine model in the mount is no more, and while the more splendid temple which Solomon raised is long since laid in desolation, the most high God, superior to all temples made with hands, infinitely superior even to heaven itself, continues still to favour us with his presence, and condescends to own us for his people, and to call himself our God. Let us take the most diligent heed that we be not uncircumcised in heart and in ears, and that we do not, after so fatal an example, resist the Holy Spirit, and by rejecting Christ, incur incur a guilt greater than that of the Jews, who violated the law received through ranks of attendant angels: for the milder and gentler form, in which this divine lawgiver has appeared to us, Ver. will render the ingratitude and guilt of our rebellion far more 53 aggravated than theirs.

The reproofs of the holy martyr Stephen were indeed plain and faithful, and therefore they were so much the more kind; but instead of attending to so just and so wise a remonstrance, those sinners against their own souls stopped their ears, lift up an outrage 57 outs cry, and like so many savage beasts rush upon him to destroy him; overwhelming that head with stones which shone like an angel of God: Fatal instance of prejudice and of rage! But how 56 were all the terrors of this murderous crew, when armed with the instruments of immediate death, dispelled by the glorious vision of Christ at the right hand of God! Well might he then remain in 59 trepid, well might he commend his departing spirit into the hands of his divine Saviour, as able to keep what he committed to him until that day. 2 Tim i. 12.

Let us with holy pleasure behold this bright image of our Redeemer, this first martyr, who following so closely his recent steps, (as he suffered so near the place that had been the scene of his agonies,) appears to have imbibed so much of the same Spirit: Having thus solemnly consigned his soul to Christ, all that remained was, like Christ, to pray for his murderers; full of compassion for their souls, while dying by their hands, he only said, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge, and then gently fell asleep; expired in holy composure and serenity of soul, and slept sweetly in the soft bosom of his Saviour.

O Saul, couldst thou have believed, if one had told thee, while thou wast urging on the cruel multitude, while thou wast glorying over his venerable corpse, that the time should come when thou thyself shouldst be twice stoned in the cause in which he died, and triumph in having committed thy soul likewise to that Jesus whom thou wast now blaspheming! In this instance his dying prayer was illustriously answered! In this instance the lion lies down with the lamb, and the leopard with the kid, (Isa. xi. 6,) and it is most delightful to think, that the martyr Stephen, and Saul that barba- rous persecutor, (afterwards his brother both in faith and in martyrdom, are now joined in bonds of everlasting friendship, and dwell together in the happy company of those who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb: (Rev. vii. 14.) May we at length be joined with them, and in the mean time let us glorify God in both!
